Dr. Koussevitzky announced during his remarks, that Eric Crozier is coming from London to serve as stage director for "Peter Grimes," the new American opera by Benjamin Britten which will be given three performances by members of the opera department at the Music Center school, on Aug. 6, 7 and 9, as its American premier. Britten will also be present, he said.

Hugh B. Cabot, pesident of the Boston Symphony, also spoke, disclosing that 33 states, Canada, and several Central and South American countries are represented at the school, and Aaron Copland, assistant director of the school, welcomed its students. Members of the faculty played and the students of the school sang Thompson's "Allelujah" to complete the program in the concert hall, after which tea was served ~~in the gardens to the 800~~ guests.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
JUL 1 1946

All devotees of Bach and music lovers in general will appreciate the new recordings by ~~Serge Kousse~~vitzky and his Boston Symphony of the Bach Brandenburg Concertos No. 3 and 4, along with the Prelude in E. This delightful music from a period when life was more liesurely and song more conventional was recorded at Tangelwood, the Lenox, Mass. estate where the Bostons feature the Berkshire Music Festivals in summer. The Koussevitzky approach to Bach is well known—a masterly interpretive art. None of this is lost in the Victor Album M-1050.

Not everyone can sing those lovely Schumann lieder. However, Marian Anderson reveals an artistry that matches the golden splendor of her voice in "Der Nussbaum," and "Stille Tranen," with Franz Rupp at the piano. Victor single record 11-9173.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE - JULY 1

Koussevitzky Asks Subsidy For Arts at Center Opening

Conductor Also Announces Coming Of Eric Crozier and Benjamin Britten for 'Peter Grimes'

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at the opening of the fourth season of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon called for state support of the fine arts. He announced that "Peter Grimes," the opera by Benjamin Britten to have its first American performance by the school Aug. 6, will be directed by Eric Crozier, stage director of the world premiere at Sadlers Wells Opera House in London. Mr. Crozier and the composer will come from England for the event.

Subsidy of Arts

Declaring that none of the democratic governments are concerned with the vital question of the subsidy of the arts—especially musical art, Dr. Koussevitzky asked, "Is it not time for this government, leading among democracies, to give a permanent support to the fine arts? The course of history reveals that art and culture were instrumental fect forms of government, as in ancient Greece or Rome" and described the American Constitution as "a document created by the noblest, the most cultivated and universal minds of our age. These great men—scientists, thinkers and writers, represented the spiritual flowering of their epoch and of their people," he said.

"More than any other art," Dr. Koussevitzky continued, "music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers. Music is the element of unity among men. Even religion and the churches, having lost their unity, have also lost their moral control and their power over the conscience of men. It is our great blessing and deep joy to be serving music at a time when its radiant influence is revealed to the world with such conviction, and when the meaning of music is justifying also the meaning of man's existence."

Tanglewood
Continued on Second Page

Cabot Presides

Presiding, Hugh B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said that for the first time the whole musical program will be conducted by the orchestra, expressing appreciation of the generous gift of the music shed by the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Association who built it and formerly sponsored the concerts. He noted the addition of the chamber music concerts under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation and the Bach-Mozart concerts.

"I think you are very lucky," Mr. Cabot told the 400 students, "to be able to come here. The eyes of the world are upon you." Declaring that there were formerly residents of the county who didn't like the idea of the Music Center, he asserted, "Your conduct must be on a par with the music here—of the highest character."

Aaron Copland, assistant director of the school, described its purpose as "the creation of musical atmosphere and a standard of musical excellence." He announced, in addition to concerts and opera, lectures by Howard Hansen, William Shuman, composer, and four lectures by Olin Downes of the New York Times. He said that 33 states, Washington, D. C., Canada and seven countries in South and Central America are represented in the student body. "This is a thrilling place to be for six weeks," he concluded. "I don't know how I can stand it. The atmosphere is so stimulating, so alive."

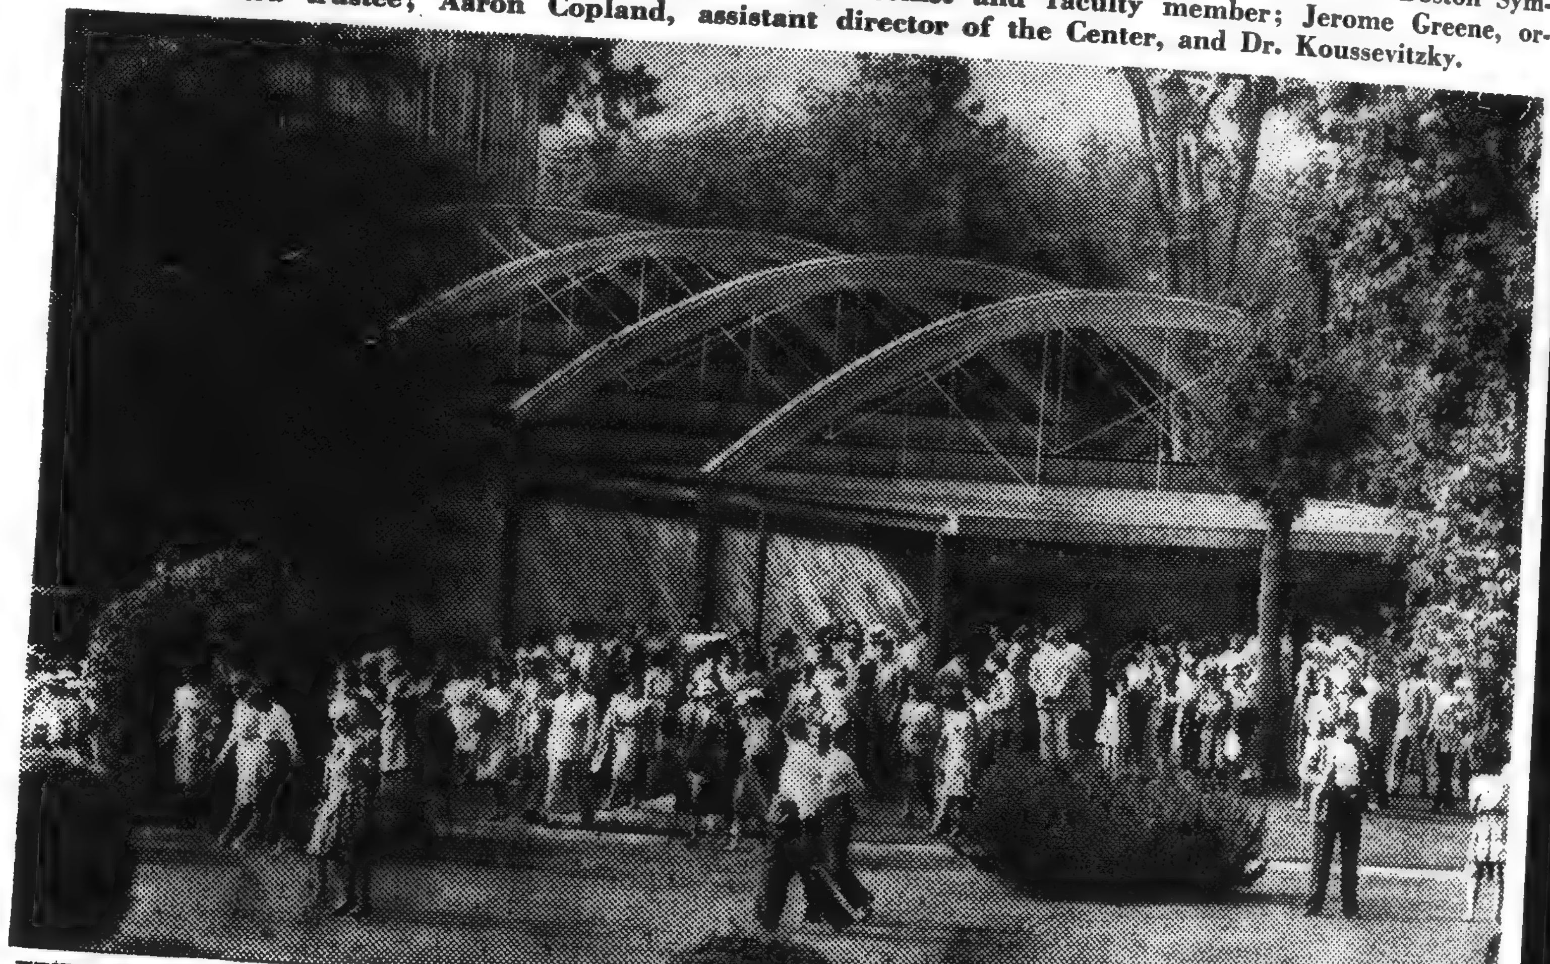
Sing "Allelulia"

Nearly 1000 students, guests and friends of the Berkshire Music Center attended the exercises in the theater-concert hall. At the conclusion Randall Thompson's "Allelulia," directed by Hugh Ross, was sung by the school and the two last movements of the Brahms Quartet in G Minor were played by members of the faculty. The men in the faculty, and the one woman, Miss Katharine Wolff of Philadelphia, teacher of solfege, were introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky.

In the audience were trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Association and members of the Tanglewood Advisory Committee. Members of the festival board attending were: Mrs. William Felten Barrett, Mrs. Bruce Crane, Mrs. Davie Lloyd, Mrs. John C. Lynch, Robert K. Wheeler, Philip Marshall Brown, Henry W. Dwight and Edward S. Rogers. James T. Owens, Mr. Dwight, Mr. Wheeler, George W. Edman and Lester Roberts.

Tea was served in the garden following the ceremony.

A PLEA FOR THE ARTS: Dr. Serge Koussevitzky addressing students and friends of the Berkshire Music Center yesterday pleaded for a subsidy of the arts saying that "music is the element of unity among men." Left to right: Henry B. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Gregor Piatigorsky, world-famous cellist and faculty member; Jerome Greene, orchestra trustee; Aaron Copland, assistant director of the Center, and Dr. Koussevitzky.



HEADING FOR TEA: When the exercises were concluded in the concert opera hall at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon, the students, faculty and friends headed for the gardens where tea was served.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 1 - 1946

British Stage Director For Tanglewood Opera

LENOX, Mass., June 30—In an address marking the opening of the Berkshire Music Center School at Tanglewood this afternoon, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky said Eric Crozier was coming from London to be stage director of the new opera, "Peter Grimes." The première American performance will be given at Tanglewood Tuesday evening, Aug. 6. The opera will also be given in the Music Shed on Aug. 7 and 8. Benjamin Britten, its composer, will be present.

Dr. Koussevitzky suggested that democratic governments subsidize the arts, especially musical art. H said: "Today, in a period of unprecedented crisis, when men find no common contact and mans of understanding each other, when all notions and values have lost their former significance, music is the element of unity among men."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

JUL 1 - 1946

Koussevitsky Says Art Needs Support Of State

Stockbridge, Mass., July 1—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, contends that "art needs the support of the state and demands a department of fine arts."

In a talk at the reopening of the Berkshire Music Center's fourth season yesterday, he declared:

"More than any other art music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical racial and religious barriers. Music is the element of unity among men."

The Berkshire student body of more than 400 includes musicians from 33 states and the District of Columbia, Canada and South America.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

JUL 1 - 1946

Koussevitsky Asks State Support Of Music And Arts

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., July (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, contends that "art needs the support of the state and demands a department of fine arts."

In a talk at the reopening of the Berkshire Music Center's fourth season Sunday, he declared:

"More than any other art, music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers. Music is the element of unity among men."

The Berkshire student body of more than 400 includes musicians from 33 states and the District of Columbia, Canada and South America.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

JUL 1 - 1946

Koussevitsky Would Have State Support Fine Arts

STOCKBRIDGE, July 1 (AP)—Dr Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, contends that "art needs the support of the state and demands a department of fine arts."

In a talk at the reopening of the Berkshire music center's fourth season yesterday, he declared:

"More than any other art music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers. Music is the element of unity among men."

The Berkshire student body of more than 400 includes musicians from 33 states and the District of Columbia, Canada and South America.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

JUL 1 - 1946

Dr. Koussevitzky Urges Federal Support to Music

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., July 1 (AP).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, suggested Sunday that the time has arrived for the U. S. to give state support to music—"the element of unity among men."

"Art needs the support of the state and demands a department of fine arts," he said in a talk at the reopening of the Berkshire Music Center's fourth season.

"More than any other art," Dr. Koussevitzky said, "music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers. Music is the element of unity among men."

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

JUL 1 - 1946

Koussevitzky Speaks

PITTSFIELD, Mass., June 30—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, spoke today before an audience of more than 1,000 persons at the reopening of the Berkshire music center at Tanglewood.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JUL 1 - 1946

Koussevitsky Says Art Needs Support of State

STOCKBRIDGE, July 1 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, contends that "art needs the support of the state and demands a department of fine arts."

In a talk at the reopening of the Berkshire music center's fourth season yesterday, he declared:

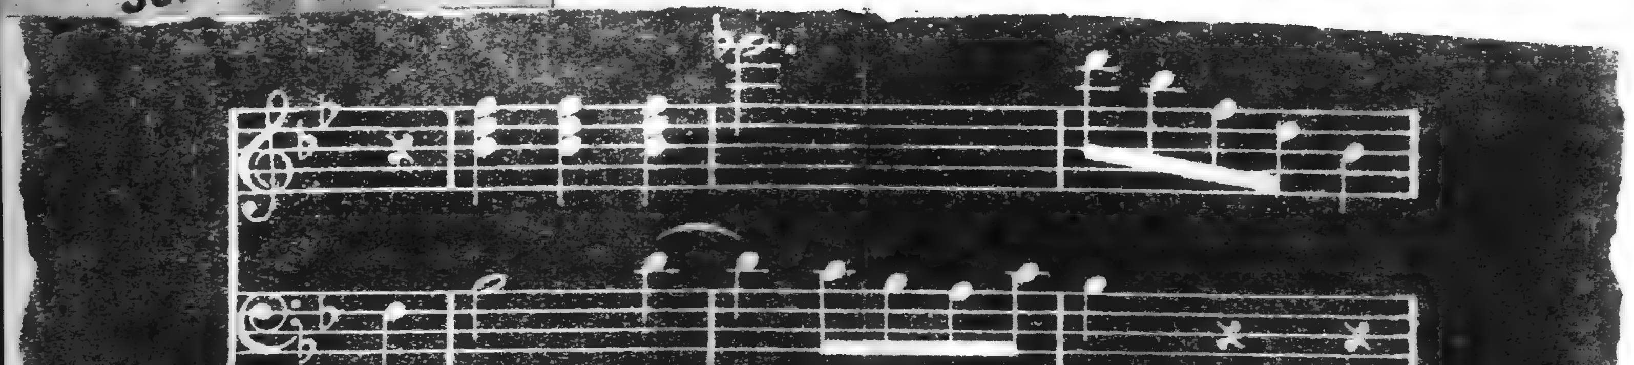
"More than any other art music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers. Music is the element of unity among men."

The Berkshire student body of more than 400 includes musicians from 33 states and the District of Columbia, Canada and South America.

[165]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUN 30 1946



Musicians' Mecca in the Berkshires

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD. By M. A. De Wolfe Howe. 96 pp. Illustrated. New York: Vanguard Press. $2.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

WITH the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Berkshire Music Center, joint adornments of the American summer musical scene, ready for resumption in a few weeks, it is timely to have this graceful appreciation of the place and the spirit of Tanglewood as it is today and as it was almost a hundred years ago. Mr. Howe, historian of the Boston Symphony in an earlier volume, now deals with this exciting venture of the Bostonians and their conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Mr. Koussevitzky has contributed a brief introduction, and at the end there is a listing of all the programs of the festival from its beginning in 1934. Even with these additions this is a small book. It is not an effort to deal with all the minutiae of the short but proud history of the festival. But high points of the story are told, and the quality of the undertaking is conveyed. Mr. Howe gives the Tanglewood of today perspective with his gentle evocation of the Tanglewood of the middle of the nineteenth century, when Nathaniel Hawthorne lived and wrote on the site.

Mr. Howe speaks of the terrible danger of writing about an institution like this in the "House Organ or College Catalogue style." The temptation must have been great. For the author admires everything about the institution. It is hard to differ with him. And yet even a brief laudatory volume would benefit from a touch of conflict.

There has been some conflict, too. Mr. Howe does not forget the thunderstorm of Aug. 12, 1937, when the Boston Symphony played under a huge circus tent. The music was by Wagner, but the more dramatic effects were the wind and the rain, the thunder and the lightning, with the tent and the 5,000 people under it in peril. That concert remains one of the most dramatic, for extramusical reasons, that I have ever attended. But the aftermath, before the night was out, brought on some of the conflict Mr. Howe omits. He does recall that Mr. Koussevitzky said he would not conduct at the festival in the future unless the tent were replaced by a permanent structure. But he might have mentioned the indignation with which Mr. Koussevitzky lashed out at the people who had insisted a tent would do.

Funds were raised, and the handsome, acoustically felicitous shed was ready for the following summer. In other seasons the plant expanded. The school and music center were instituted. More and more people made pilgrimages to the Berkshires to see and to hear. Our entrance into the war cut into the development, but there is little doubt that this summer it will flourish even more generously than before.

HERE again there might be occasion to spice the story with conflict. As Mr. Howe tells it, everybody in the area is happy about the festival and center. Probably the vast majority are delighted. But I have run into reports of resentments; there have been residents who were not pleased with the huge public that swarms into the countryside and "intrudes," as they say, on their quiet and seclusion.

But the music at Tanglewood seems here to stay. The festival and the center have been built carefully and well. This little tribute will probably be a welcome souvenir to many people of rewarding afternoons and evenings of great music and fine vistas.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JUL 1 - 1946

"Peter Grimes" Will Receive U. S. Premiere at Tanglewood

Koussevitzky Proposes State Support of Art at Music Center Opening

PITTSFIELD, June 30—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the reopening of the Berkshire music center at Tanglewood this afternoon for its fourth season, announced that the opera "Peter Grimes," to receive its first American performance by the school Aug. 6, will be directed by Eric Crozier, stage director of its world premiere in London, and that the composer, who was commissioned to write it for the center, will be present. The opera was chosen to reopen the Sadler Wells opera house after the war.

Dr. Koussevitzky also declared that "art needs the support of the state, and demands a department of fine arts. None of the democratic governments are concerned with the subsidy of arts—especially musical art," he said. "Is it not time for this government, leading among democracies, to give a permanent support to the fine arts?" He said that "the course of history reveals that art and culture were instrumental in attaining perfect, or near perfect, forms of government, as in ancient Greece or Rome," and described the American constitution as "a document created by the noblest, the most cultivated and universal minds of our age."

"In ignoring the arts," he said, "the State will inevitably lose the sustaining interest and influence of the foremost minds and the creative spiritual forces of the nation. More than any other art, music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers. Music is the element of unity among men. Even religion and the churches, having lost their unity, have also lost their moral control and their power over the conscience of men. It is our great blessing and deep joy to be serving music at a time when its radiant influence is revealed to the world with such conviction, and when the meaning of music is justifying also the meaning of man's existence."

Aaron Copland, assistant director of the school declared its purpose to be "to creat musical atmosphere and a standard of musical excellence." He stated that 33 states and the District of Columbia, Canada and South America are represented in the student body of more than 400, including 16 students of composition.

Henry B. Cabot, Boston Symphony Orchestra president, presiding, announced that for the first time the whole musical program at Tanglewood would be conducted by the orchestra, as the concert shed, seating 6500, had been given by the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Association who built it.

Classes at the Berkshire Music Center will begin tomorrow morning for 360 boys and girls and men and women enrolled. Classes will be held at Tanglewood itself, Sedgewick Hall, the Congregational Chapel, the Lenox and Tracy Schools in Lenox and at Barrington School, Great Barrington. The Lenox School will board 110 women, Tracy Hall will accomodate 150 men and 65 women and 35 men will be at the Barrington School.

Eight students from South and Central America, whose travel and maintenance have been arranged through the Institute of International Education and the State Department are on hand. The faculty of the school is composed of 30 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and 14 other musicians.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 1 - 1946

DR KOUSSEVITSKY TALKS AT OPENING OF MUSIC CENTER

Boston Symphony Conductor Announces First U. S. Showing of 'Peter Grimes' Will Be August 6

Lenox, June 30—In an address to mark the opening of the Berkshire Music Center school at Tanglewood this afternoon Dr Serge Koussevitsky said that Eric Crozier is coming over from London to be stage director of the new opera "Peter Grimes," the premiere American performance of which is to be given at Tanglewood Tuesday night, August 6. It will also be given in the music shed August 7 and 9. Benjamin Britten, composer of the opera also will be present. It has been performed in London.

In his 30-minute address Dr Koussevitzky suggested that Democratic governments subsidize the arts, especially musical art. He asked the question whether it is not time for this government to give a permanent support to the fine arts, to reorganize and acknowledge the signal need of the times.

Living Pulse of Art

"We artists are the living pulse of art," he said; "the state is the ground upon which art finds stability and security. Art needs the support of the state and demands a department of the fine arts. The state needs art for the purpose of fortifying and completing its present structure. In ignoring the arts the state will inevitably lose the sustaining interest and influence of the foremost minds and the creative spiritual forces of the nation."

Addressing the 400 students enroled Dr Koussevitszy said: "We shall again seek new answers to arising questions, a wider access to inexhaustible treasures of musical art, a higher vision of music as a profession, as a vocation and as a creative cultural force. In the progress of life the question of the creative vocation of man is also the question of new consciousness.

The Concert-theater hall was nearly filled with an audience of 800. Henry B. Cabot, president of trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who presided, said that 33 states, Canada and a number of Central and South American countries are represented among the school registrants.

Aaron Copland, assistant director of the school welcomed the students who occupied seats in the center of the theater. A quartet, Richard Burgin, leader played the last two movements of the G minor Brahms quartet. Hugh Ross led a group of the students singing Randall Thompson's "Allelujah." Punch and ice cream were served by Curtis hotel in the gardens. The weather was perfect.

WACO, TEXAS
NEWS TRIBUNE

JUL 2 1946

Book Review

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD SCENE OF THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVALS, By M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard $2).

Tanglewood from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934 to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield-Stockbridge-Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years only 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

JUL 2 - 1946

* * *

Tanglewood Programs Completed for Concerts

The programs are now complete for 17 concerts to be given this Summer at Tanglewood in Lenox by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky and by chamber groups. The Berkshire Festival proper, consisting of nine concerts to be given in the Music Shed under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction July 25 to Aug. 11, already has been announced and will include the new Ninth Symphony of Shostakovitch, which Dr. Koussevitzky has just received from Russia and which will have its first American performance at the Festival's opening.

Two Bach-Mozart programs, each repeated, will be given by members of the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in the Theater-Concert Hall, July 13-14 and July 20-21.

Four chamber music concerts will be given on four Tuesday nights in the same auditorium under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation.

Through the six-week session of the Berkshire Music Center, Dr. Koussevitzky, director, student groups will give many chamber, orchestra and choral concerts and the first American presentation of Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes." All school performances, as well as the Tuesday chamber concerts, will be open by invitation to the friends of the Berkshire Music Cetner.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

JUL 1 - 1946

Koussevitsky Sees Need Of State Dept. Of Music

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, contends that "art needs the support of the state and demands a department of fine arts."

In a talk at the reopening of the Berkshire Music Center's fourth season, yesterday, he declared:

"More than any other art music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers. Music is the element of unity among men."

The Berkshire student body of more than 400 includes musicians from 33 states and the District of Columbia, Canada and South America.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JUL 1 - 1946

Koussevitzky Asks U. S. Foster Arts

By the Associated Press.

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., July 1.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, suggested yesterday that the time has arrived for the U. S. to give state support to music.

"Art needs the support of the state and demands a department of fine arts," he said in a talk at the reopening of the Berkshire Music Center's fourth season. "More than any other art," Mr. Koussevitzky said, "music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers. Music is the element of unity among men."

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

JUL 4 - 1946

Famous Festival History Written

'Tale of Tanglewood' Based on Berkshire Music Events

Not quite 10 years ago, in 1937, the Fourth Berkshire Symphonic Festival presented the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky on the Tappan estate in western Massachusetts, and the world-famous Tanglewood concerts were inaugurated.

The short but rich history of the Berkshire Music Festivals has been written by M. A. DeWolfe in a book entitled, "The Tale of Tanglewood", and released by the Vanguard Press in New York. The book, which carries an introduction by Mr. Koussevitzky, is beautifully illustrated, and is obviously intended to serve as a souvenir for music lovers who have made their pilgimage to the American festival.

Hawthorne Named Estate.

In the middle of the 19th century Nathaniel Hawthorne, living in a cottage on the Tappan estate in Stockbridge, a town in the Berkshires, wrote his "Tanglewood wood Tales" and gave the name of Tanglewood to the estate.

In 1937, the Tappan heirs gave Tanglewood as a site for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival which, in 1934 and 1935 presented summer symphonies under the direction of Henry Hadley at Hanna Farm, and in 1936 presented the Boston Symphony orchestra at Holmwood, once the estate of George Westinghouse. The festival was moved to Tanglewood, and the following year a huge music shed was constructed of steel and wood which not only afforded protection from the weather but also provided near-perfect acoustics. The property now belongs to the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Although its growth was limited by wartime travel restrictions, Tanglewood has become one of the great centers of the world of music. In 1940, the Berkshire Music Center was opened, offering training to advanced students in music. As the festival centers of Europe, such as that at Salzburg, were discontinued. Tanglewood increased in stature. Approximately 90,000 persons attended the nine concerts in the final series in 1941 before the war interupted the festival.

Through the war, the music center for students has flourished, and the concert series was again resumed this year with even larger audiences reported than ever before.

---

ighting

First Concert By Tanglewood Students Tonight

The first concert by students at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will be heard tonight at 8.15. There will be four conductors, all students in the conducting class of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra will be composed of advanced students. The concert is open to Friends of the Center.

The program will be as follows: Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, Gerard Samuel, conductor; Mennin's "Folk Overture," Peter Mennin, conductor; Sibelius' Symphony No. 5, Seymour Lipkin, conductor; Rimsky Korsakoff's "Easter Overture," Eleazar Sarvalho, conductor.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 5 - 1946

MRS ROOSEVELT WILL BE GUEST AT TANGLEWOOD

President's Widow Among Those To Hear Shostakovich Symphony Premiere

Lenox, July 5—Mrs Franklin D. Roosevelt is planning to attend the opening concert of the Berkshire Music festival at Tanglewood, Lenox. With Mrs Henry Morgenthau Jr., whose guest she will be, she will hear on the evening of the 25th the first performance in America of Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth symphony by the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

Among the distinguished listeners to the festival concerts on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons from the 25th to August 11 will be Sir Alexander Cadogan, British delegate to the United Nations conference; Commodore James K. Vardaman, formerly President Truman's naval aide, now appointed to the federal reserve board; Lady Berendsen of the New Zealand legation in Washington, D. C.; Princess Emina Toussoum of Egypt; Adolf A. Berle Jr., recently ambassador to the Court of St James', and Mrs Myron Taylor, wife of the president's personal representative at the Vatican.

The wives of two radio commentators, Lowell Thomas and H. V. Kaltenborn are planning to attend, as are Mrs Guy P. Gannett, president of the American Federation of Music Clubs, and Mrs Andrew Hepburn, who with her aunt, Miss Mary A. Tappan, gave Tanglewood, their summer home, to the Boston orchestra.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

JUL 5 1946

'Carnegie Hall' To Be Made on Spot

By DOROTHY MANNERS

HOLLYWOOD, July 4 (INS)—The most pretentious Hollywood movie ever to be filmed away from Hollywood is "Carnegie Hall," with Producers Bill le Baron and Boris Morros announcing that their Technicolor extravaganza gets going in New York Aug. 5. Le Baron and Morros have been working for weeks on the headaches presented by such an extensive and expensive production away from the home base and its expert technicians. But problems or no problems—they've decided that the logical place to shoot "Carnegie Hall" is in Carnegie Hall.

Jascha Heifetz, Walter Bruno, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Rise Stevens are the latest artists to be added to the cast of great musicians already contracted for this picture. Previously set are Lily Pons, Artur Rubenstein and the Vatican Choir. Of course, there is a full cast of Hollywood players, yet to be announced, who will take the trip to New York to carry on the romantic theme.

Rex Harrison was put in one of the most embarrassing positions that can happen to a visitor to this country by the entirely false story, last week, that he was seeking American citizenship to the tune of hisses and boos from his native England. Harrison likes America, Americans and making movies here—and so a flat denial would have left him open to crticism among fans he has made in this country. On the other hand, he is an Englishman and intends to remain a citizen of his native country.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

JUL 5 - 1946

'CARNEGIE HALL' SET OF ALL LOCATIONS FOR CARNEGIE HALL

Heifetz, Rise Stevens, Rubenstein, Bruno, Pons in Cast

By DOROTHY MANNERS

Hollywood, July 5.—The most pretentious Hollywood movie ever to be filmed away from Hollywood is "Carnegie Hall," with producers Bill Le Baron and Boris Morros announcing their technicolor extravaganza gets going in New York, Aug. 5. Le Baron and Morros have been working for weeks on the headaches presented by such an extensive and expensive production away from the home base and its expert technicians. But problems or no problems—they've decided the logical place to shoot "Carnegie Hall" is in Carnegie Hall.

Jascha Heifetz, Walter Bruno, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Rise Stevens are the latest to be added to the cast. Previously set are Lily Pons, Artur Rubenstein and the Vatican Choir. Of course, there is a full cast of Hollywood players, yet to be announced, who will take the trip to New York to carry on the romantic theme.

* * *

When Bill Pine and Bill Thomas started making programmers for Paramount their slogan was, "We don't want to make million dollar pictures, we just want to make a million dollars." Well, I wouldn't be knowing how far the boys are from their goal but they must be doing all right because they're shooting a million on "Adventure Island" which is Robert Louis Stevenson's famous "Ebb Tide." The two Bills want a sarong girl to star and put in a pitch for Dorothy Lamour, but were told her schedule was closed. So they're looking for a new charmer who wears no clothes as well as Dottie.

* * *

Hollywood in shorts: Seems Jack Oakie's wooing of his ex-wife, Venita Varden, in New York wasn't as serious as reported. He's constantly at the Troc with Victoria Horne, the new heartbeat; Hollywood's newsreel theatre is billing the Louis-Conn fight as "The Great Waltz;" did you know you can now get Lassie's "autograph?" Her trainer has taken paw prints to circulate among admirers of the canine star; radio actor Les Tremayne secretly married radio actress Alice Rhinehart several months ago; the Tony and Sally de Marco opening at Ciro's Wednesday night got off to a flying start and while we are on the subject of night clubs, Harry Richman is topping everything he has ever done in the past at the Florentine Gardens; pretty soon now, Marissa Bague, Margaret O'Brien's aunt, who has done so much to guide her juvenile relative, leaves for New York to resume her own career. She's a dancer and a good one; Mrs. Cornel Wilde may land a plum role in "Forever Amber" as a result of the beautiful color test she made at 20th; Jane Greer, the ex-Mrs. Rudy Vallee, of whom it has been said, "Always a test girl—but never a lead," makes 'em eat those words by snagging the second feminine role in "They Wouldn't Believe Me" with Robert Young and Susan Hayward at RKO. It's the Cosmopolitan mag story by Gordon McDonnell. That's all today. See you tomorrow.

MODESTO, CALIF.
BEE

JUL 5 1946

Work On Carnegie Hall Film Will Start August 5th In New York

By DOROTHY MANNERS
Staff Correspondent, International News Service

HOLLYWOOD, July 5. — The most pretentious Hollywood movie ever to be filmed away from Hollywood is Carnegie Hall, with producers Bill Le Baron and Boris Morros announcing that their technicolor extravanganza gets going in New York on August 5th. Le Baron and Morros have been working for weeks on the headaches presented by such an extensive and expensive production away from the home base and its expert technicians. But problems or no problems—they've decided that the logical place to shoot Carnegie Hall is in Carnegie Hall.

Jascha Heifetz, Walter Bruno, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Rise Stevens are the latest artists to be added to the cast of great musicians already contracted for this picture. Previously set are Lily Pons, Artur Rubenstein and the Vatican Choir. Of course, there is a full cast of Hollywood players, yet to be announced, who will take the trip to New York to carry on the romantic theme.

Hollywood in shorts: Seems Jack Oakie's wooing of his exwife, Venita Varden, in New York wasn't as serious as reported. He's constantly at the Troc with Victoria Horne, the new heartbeat; Hollywood's Newsreel Theater is billing the Louis-Conn fight as The Great Waltz; did you know you can now get Lassie's "autograph"? Her trainer has taken paw prints to circulate among admirers of the canine star; radio actor Les Tremayne secretly married radio actress Alice Rhinehart several months ago; the Tony and Sally De Marco opening at Ciro's Wednesday night got off to a flying start and while we are on the subject of night clubs, Harry Richman is topping everything he has ever done in the past at the Florentine Gardens; pretty soon now Marissa Bague, Margaret O'Brien's aunt, who has done so much to guide her juvenile relative, leaves for New York to resume her own career. She's a dancer and a good one; Mrs. Cornel Wilde may land a plum role in Forever Amber as a result of the beautiful color test she made at Twentieth, Jane Greer, the ex Mrs. Rudy Vallee, of whom it has been said, "always a test girl—but never a lead" makes 'em eat those words by snagging the second feminine role in They Wouldn't Believe Me, with Robert Young and Susan Hayward at RKO. It's the Cosmopolitan Mag story by Gordon McDonnell; some one asked me the other day how I liked doing a column and my only answer is—writing four columns in two days in order to take off the Fourth of July and Saturday afternoon shouldn't happen to a dog! That's all today. See you tomorrow.

ANDERSON, S. C.
INDEPENDENT-TRIBUNE

JUL 5 - 1946

Great Cast Of Artists To Appear In "Carnegie Hall"

By DOROTHY MANNERS

HOLLYWOOD, July 4—(INS)—The most pretentious Hollywood movie ever to be filmed away from Hollywood is "Carnegie Hall," with producers Bill le Baron and Boris Morros announcing that their technicolor extravaganza gets going in New York on August 5. Le Baron and Morros have been working for weeks of the headaches presented by such extensive and expensive production away from the home base and its expert technicians. But problems or no problems — they've decided that the logical place to shoot "Carnegie Hall" is in Carnegie Hall.

Jascha Heifetz, Walter Bruno, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Rise Stevens are the latest artists to be added to the cast of great musicians already contracted for this picture. Previously set are Lily Pons, Arthur Rubenstein and the Vatican Choir. Of course, there is a full cast of Hollywood players, yet to be announced, who will take the trip to New York to carry on the romantic theme.

Rex Harrison was put in one of the most embarrassing positions that can happen to a visitor to this country by the entirely false story, last week, that he was seeking American citizenship to the tune of hisses and boos from his native England. Harrison likes America, Americans and making movies here—and so a flat denial would have left him open to criticism among fans he made in this country. On the other hand, he is an Englishman and intends to remain a citizen of his native country.

When Bill Pine and Bill Thomas started making programmers for Paramount their slogan was, "We Don't Want To Make Million Dollar Pictures, We Just want To Make A Million Dollars." Well, I wouldn't be knowing how far the boys are from their goal but they must be doing all right because they're shooting a million on "Adventure Island" which is Robert Louis Stevenson's famous "Ebb Tide." The two Bills want a sarong girl to star and put in a pitch for Dorothy Lamour, but were told her schedule was closed. So they're looking for a new charmer who wears no clothes as well as Dottie.

Hollywood In Shorts: Seems Jack Oakie's wooing of his ex-wife, Venita Varden, in New York wasn't as serious as reported. He's constantly at the Troc with Victoria Horne, the new heartbeat; Hollywood's Newsreel Theater is billing the Louis-Conn fight as "The Great Waltz;" did you know you can now get Lassie's "Autograph?" Her trainer has taken paw prints to circulate among admirers of the canine star; radio actor Les Treymayne secretly married radio actress Alice Rhinehart several months ago; the Tony and Sally de Marco opening at Ciro's Wednesday night got off to a flying start and while we are on the subject of night clubs, Harry Richman is topping everything he has ever done in the past at the Florentine Gardens; pretty soon now, Marissa Bague, Margaret O'Brien's aunt, who has done so much to guide her juvenile relative, leaves for New York to resume her own career. She's a dancer and a good one; Mrs. Cornel Wilde may land a plum role in "Forever Amber" as a result of the beautiful color test she made at 20th; Jane Greer, the ex-Mrs. Rudy Valee, of whom it has been

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

JUL 5 1946

RECORDING the RECORDS

By MILTON WIDDER

THE TESTAMENT OF FREEDOM, a musical setting by Randall Thompson to four passages from the writings of Thomas Jefferson, is the kind of modern music that will go far in public acceptance. It is a serious, well worked out and inspiring work with substance and well defined melodic lines.

It has the added advantages of being performed by America's foremost orchestra today—the Boston under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky—and the eminently fine Harvard Glee Club, of which G. Wallace Woodworth is choral conductor.

Thompson wrote the work in honor of the 200th anniversary of one of the greatest Americans—Jefferson, one of the founding fathers. Its simplicity thrills the listener and its sincerity is a worthy tribute to the name of Jefferson.

The import of the text may be gleaned from the following subtitles: "The God Who Gave Us Life Gave Us Liberty," "We Have Counted the Cost of This Contest," "We Fight Not For Glory or For Conquest," and "I Shall Not Die Without a Hope That Light and Liberty Are On Steady Advance." These words written two centuries ago still are alive and revealing.

The album is Victor's—M-1054—and sells for $3.85.

Ibert's ESCALES is a musical seascape, painted with tones of impressionism by the New York Philharmonic under the direction of Artur Rodzinski. (Columbia X-263, $3).

The pictures are of three ports visited by the composer on a Mediterranean cruise. While this interpretation did not come directly from the creator, he never denied it after reviewers attributed the work to that episode in his life. The ports described are Palermo, Tunis and Valencia. The music is light and lovely.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

JUL 5 1946

Music Festival To Start July 25

LENOX, MASS. — (U.P.) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its annual Berkshire music festival July 25 in gala pre-war style at Tanglewood, in the hills of western Massachusetts.

A series of nine concerts extending over three week-ends will be given in a bucolic setting. Thousands of music lovers from every corner of the nation are expected to attend. Some will have seats in the music shed. The others sprawl helter-skelter on the lawns of the rambling 200-acre estate—are out of luck if it rains.

The program begins and ends with Beethoven symphonies. However, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has included the works of modern composers, among whom are Rachmaninoff, Copland, Shostakovitch and Martinu.

The festivals have been held annually since their inauguration in 1934. Each time they draw a bigger crowd. The Tanglewood estate, where once Nathaniel Hawthorne lived and wrote "Tanglewood Tales," was presented to the symphony orchestra in 1936 by Mrs. Andres Hepburn and her aunt, Miss Mary A. Tappan. The shed was built in 1938. A crowd of 95,000 persons gathered for the series of concerts in 1941.

Nearly a month before the opening of the festival the Berkshire music center opens for six weeks beginning July 1. Unique in purpose, the school gives young musicians a chance to polish their performance before entering the professional fields.

The school was closed during the war, but now has accepted more than 300 students in various departments such as composition, instrumentation, conducting and opera.

Those Howes

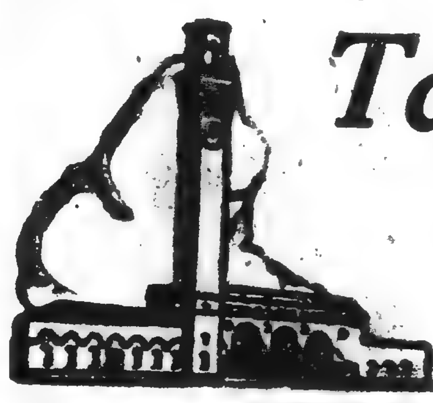
He Jul 14 '46

What an accomplished and achieving set those Howes are! Miss Helen Howe's book, "The Happy Few," now has the attention which was given a few years ago to the Holmes-Pollock Letters, compiled and edited by her brother, Mark De Wolfe Howe, who has become a professor at the Harvard Law School.

Quincy Howe is one of the best of our broadcasters, an outstanding figure in the field of broadcasting and the movies, and a prominent, successful writer. The father, Mark Antony De Wolfe Howe, has been a prolific and distinguished author of good biography and other forms of literature for many years. The three men's autobiographies are on the same page of the 1944-45 "Who's Who," thereby making a tie with the record of the Comptons—Arthur H., Karl T. of M. I. T., and Professor Wilson M., Miss Helen Howe might well have been autobiographied in that same "Who's Who."

Like many other notable individuals, of whom the Brontes are among the most famous, the Howes are children of a clergyman—and therefore they had a head start on the Comptons, whose father was a college professor of philosophy. President Carmichael of Tufts and similar recognized authorities in the field can argue stoutly that the offspring of the manse are not so exceptionally gifted as is generally thought, but the list of talented persons with an early church environment is long and pretty impressive. German records going far into the past support the popular belief, and the new distinction of Helen Howe brings the theory right down to date.

HE WATERBURY DEMOCRAT, WATERBURY, CONN., WEDNESDAY, JULY 3, 1946



Tall Tower Topics

BY THE MAN IN THE TOWER

Tanglewood Tale. . . We have received a copy from the publishers of "The Tale of Tanglewood," by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, with an introduction by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tanglewood has been the scene of the Berkshire Music Festival since 1937, when it became the Summer home of the Boston Symphony. Tanglewood, the former Tappan estate near Stockbridge, Mass., has many interesting associations, one of which is that it was later called by the present name by the famous American writer, Nathaniel Hawthorne, the name suggesting itself to the writer from the nature of some of the nearby country, especially a deep glen, filled with trees, tiny pools and waterfals, accounting for the author's well known "Tanglewood Tales." Many visitors to the Berkshires are familiar with the country around Stockbridge and Lenox and what is now called Tanglewood, the setting for the famous Summer concerts. They also have seen the small red house that was the home of Hawthorne, not far from the former Carnegie estate that is now a Jesuit novitiate. The lovely rolling hills surrounding and the up-to-date music shed that houses the orchestra are all given their proper rating in "The Tale of Tanglewood," a fine little gem of writing especially appealing to New Englanders who have a particular regard for the nearby Berkshires.

CANANDAIGUA, N. Y.
MESSENGER

JUL 6 - 1946

Guide Post Of The Best Books

By W. G. Rogers

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD: SCENE OF THE BERSKIRE MUSIC FESTIVALS, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard; $2)

Tanglewood from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield-Stockbridge-Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. It's music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, only 15 or 16 have been by Ameri-

---

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JUL 6 - 1946

Literary GUIDEPOST

By W. G. Rogers

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD: SCENE OF THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVALS, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky.

Tanglewood from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield-Stockbridge-Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, only 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

ANDERSON, IND.
HERALD

JUL 6 - 1946

Literary Guidepost

By W. G. ROGERS

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD: SCENE OF THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVALS, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard; $2).

TANGLEWOOD from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934 to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a centry ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield-Stockbridge-Lenox area known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, only 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 1 - 1946

KOUSSEVITZKY AT OPENING OF MUSIC SCHOOL

Director Asks Aid for Arts; 'Peter Grimes' Premiere August 6

Lenox, July 1—In as perfect Berkshire weather as anyone could ask, the Berkshire Music Center school was opened yesterday. The program, open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, was featured by an address by the Center's director, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, who again sounded his familiar call for more government aid for the arts.

Dr Koussevitzky also announced the American premiere of "Peter Grimes," the Benjamin Britten opera. It will be given Tuesday night, August 6, at Tanglewood with Eric Crozier, who staged the British premiere, assisting the Berkshire performance. The opera which won acclaim for its English composer last season will also be repeated in the music shed August 7 and 9, Dr Koussevitzky said.

Living Pulse of Art

"We artists are the living pulse of art," he said; "the state is the ground upon which art finds stability and security. Art needs the support of the state and demands a department of the fine arts. The state needs art for the purpose of fortifying and completing its present structure. In ignoring the arts the state will inevitably lose the sustaining interest and influence of the foremost minds and the creative spiritual forces of the nation."

Addressing the 400 students enroled Dr Koussevitzky said: "We shall again seek new answers to arising questions, a wider access to inexhaustible treasures of musical art, a higher vision of music as a profession, as a vocation and as a creative cultural force. In the progress of life the question of the creative vocation of man is also the question of a new consciousness.

The Concert-theater hall was nearly filled with an audience of 800. Henry B. Cabot, president of trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who presided, said that 33 states, Canada and a number of Central and South American countries are represented among the school registrants.

Aaron Copland, assistant director of the school welcomed the students who occupied seats in the center of the theater. A quartet, Richard Burgin, leader played the last two movements of the G minor Brahms quartet. Hugh Ross led a group of the students singing Randall Thompson's "Allelujah." Punch and ice cream were served by Curtis hotel in the gardens. The weather was perfect.

JEWISH WEEKLY TIMES July 3

MUSIC: Moses Smith

A timely publication "The Tale of Tanglewood", by M. A. De Wolfe Howe (New York: The Vanguard Press, $2.00) serves to herald this summer's Berkshire Symphonic Festival and accompanying activity on the hallowed plot of land situated in the three towns of Lenox, Lee and Stockridge, Massachusetts.

SMITH

"Hallowed" is not too strong a word, as comes out in this little volume, which tells more fully than I have seen before, about Hawthorne's residence in a small cottage on the Tappan estate, for which it was he, apparently, who invented the name Tanglewood. That name was used for one of Hawthorne's later books — "Tanglewood Tales" — while two others were actually created there, "The House of Seven Gables" and "A Wonder-Book for Girls and Boys." At the Tanglewood cottage Hawthorne was visited by some of the great in American letters; and he got to know well Melville, who was staying in nearby Pittsfield.

The description of the relation between Melville and Hawthorne is, indeed, perhaps the most arresting portion of this volume, which, despite its brevity (the actual text is only 73 pages long), is not free from wordiness and rambling. The tale of the Festivals themselves is lightly sketched, perhaps because Mr. Howe thinks it is too fresh in people's minds. Still, if the tale is worth telling at all, it is worth telling more fully, more connectedly and more dramatically than it is told here. The drama, it is true, is in, about and by Serge Koussevitzky, whereas Mr. Howe's book is about a place. Yet a description of a place is likely to boil down to people who live there, how it affects them and they it, as Mr. Howe admits by implication in his considerable attention to Hawthorne and his friends.

An appendix lists all the Festival programs from its tentative beginnings in 1934, and it illustrates both the virtues and defects of Koussevitzky as a programmaker in these later years. He steadily increased the ration of new or unfamiliar music as he felt his audiences increase in sophistication. The more regrettable, then, his tendency, when it was a question of the so-called standard repertoire, to limit himself and his hearers to overplayed masterpieces. In the six previous summers of the Festivals dispensed by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from 1936 to 1941, a total of 42 programs, the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven appeared three times, and many other works were repeated or will have been repeated by the time the approaching Festival comes to an end.

In listing the 1946 programs, incidentally, Mr. Howe shrewdly qualifies them as "announced. Subject to change." And changed they have been, of course, since the first announcement. I sometimes suspect that Koussevitzky thinks there is a virtue in changing programs.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUL 3 - 1946

Tanglewood Has Initial Concert

Berkshire Wood Wind Ensemble Opens Musical Programs of Season at Music Center.

The Berkshire Wood Wind ensemble, composed of Boston Symphony orchestra players under the direction of Louis Speyer, last evening presented the first musical program of the 1946 Berkshire Music Center season at Tanglewood, Lenox.

Tanglewood, closed during the war years except for intimate Bach-Mozart concerts presented by some of the Boston Symphony group during the 1944 and 1945 summers, was formally reopened on Sunday with ceremonies in the concert hall where last evening's program initiated the season's musical offerings. The concert was one of four sponsored by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge foundation in the Library of Congress, and was open by invitation to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center who joined by contributing financially to the Center's work. The next Tanglewood activity will be a concert by the Music Center orchestra on Friday evening which also will be an invitation affair. The first public attraction will be a Bach-Mozart concert on the 13th.

Works performed under Mr. Speyer's direction last evening included Beethoven's Quintet in E flat for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, Randall Thompson's Suite for oboe, clarinet and viola, Hindemith's Chamber Music for Five Wood Wind instruments, a trio for piano, oboe and bassoon by Poulenc, Shapero's piano-sonata in A major No. 3, which the composer performed, and Rieti's Sonata for piano, flute, oboe and bassoon.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

JUL 3 - 1946

Famous Festival History Written

'Tale of Tanglewood' Based on Berkshire Music Events

Not quite 10 years ago, in 19 the Fourth Berkshire Sympho Festival presented the Bos Symphony orchestra, directed Serge Koussevitsky, on the Tapp estate in western Massachusetts, the world-famous Tanglewood c certs were inaugurated.

The short but rich history of Berkshire Music Festivals has be written by M. A. DeWolfe in a bo entitled, "The Tale of Tanglewood and released by the Vanguard Pre in New York. The book, which car ries an introduction by Mr. Kou sevitzky, is beautifully illustrate and is obviously intended to ser as a souvenir for music lovers wh have made their pilgimage to th American festival.

Hawthorne Named Estate.

In the middle of the 19th centur Nathaniel Hawthorne, living in cottage on the Tappan estate i Stockbridge, a town in the Berk shires, wrote his "Tanglewoo wood Tales" and gave the name o Tanglewood to the estate.

In 1937, the Tappan heirs gave Tanglewood as a site for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival which, in 1934 and 1935 presented summer symphonies under the direction of Henry Hadley at Hanna Farm, and in 1936 presented the Boston Symphony orchestra at Holmwood, once the estate of George Westinghouse The festival was moved to Tanglewood, and the following year a huge music shed was constructed of steel and wood which not only afforded protection from the weather but also provided near-perfect acoustics The property now belongs to the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Although its growth was limited by wartime travel restrictions. Tanglewood has become one of the great centers of the world of music In 1940, the Berkshire Music Center was opened, offering training to advanced students in music. As the festival centers of Europe, such as that at Salzburg, were discontinued Tanglewood increased in stature Approximately 90,000 persons attended the nine concerts in the final series in 1941 before the war interupted the festivals.

Through the war, the music center for students has flourished and the concert series was again resumed this year with even larger audiences reported than ever before

---

—The Berkshi

Chamb
Opens

First Progra
Found

By JAY C. R

The Berkshire
sented the first music concerts
Concert Hall at night through Sprague Coolidge remaining three a the next three T
Last night's conce
inauguration of t
mal program at T

It is the first ti
wood has been th
such a program,
struments employ composers selected tion of the Cool
with the Berkshir
marks the uniting great educational country.

The artists of all members of phony Orchestra a as well. Louis S and director of
Wood Wind Ensem
gram which was e warding and stimu
assisted by George Viktor Polatschek,
mond Allard, ba
Valkenier, French
Franc, viola; and
as assisting pianist.

Spicy Program

Once the Beethov
flat, for piano, obo

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JUL 3 - 1946

Music

Impresarios Miss the Boat Shunning Summer Opera

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

For reasons best known to impresarios, grand opera here seems to be almost strictly a winter observance. In spring—and summer, too—the local fancy supposedly turns to symphonies and such.

The Metropolitan tried a spring season as an experiment and then abandoned it. Alfredo Salmaggi, of course, will brave any kind of weather to hammer home his pet gospel.

Then the Stadium usually comes along with a handful of performances, and if you watch the music calendars carefully you'll probably find occasional operas listed up around West 86th St. and other points north.

Only Sure in Cold.

On the whole, opera seems to wilt here in any kind of weather but freezing. Or so the impresarios think. Put on a "La Boheme" or "Traviata" at the Stadium and all New York is ready to trek up to the Lewisohn Stadium on any night but a wet one.

I would say New York's summer public is athirst for good opera, but finds scant means of getting it without long trips over land or sea. This might be looked into.

An odd feature of the music set-up here is that opera personnel marches out of town in a body the moment the subscription season ends. The remainder of the Western Hemisphere can have opera in May, June and July, but not New York.

Europe never used to pass a summer without opera going full blast within short railroad reach of wherever you might be. Many festivals concentrated on opera, and some are already going back to prewar repertories.

But for New Yorkers late spring and summer are a time for orchestras. Bands and symphonic units begin spouting everywhere, and you can even run into chamber music, if you look hard. But opera? Well, you might try Mexico City or Rio.

Opera Could Succeed.

Some smart impresario is missing a good trick in not building a second Berkshire Festival devoted exclusively to grand opera. Even repertory light opera might be included for comic relief.

My hunch is New Yorkers would flock just as readily to high class summer opera as they do to symphonics in the Berkshire hills. With present facilities and the war's changes, we can build a super-Salzburg of opera.

Of course, the warm city weather is supposed to make opera production a slow and messy business, unless given at night in the cool outdoors, where there is a risk of rain. Air conditioning ought to answer that, just as it answered some of Broadway's problems.

I see no real reason why outside companies, even foreign ones, couldn't come into a properly air-cooled Metropolitan in the summer months. Or, why the Metropolitan troupe itself couldn't linger a while longer, say into late spring.

Besides, New York is a thriving tourist center in the summer months, or at any time during the year, for that matter. Play and show-minded outsiders find what they need, and so do the movie addicts.

Hinterlanders also find their symphonic needs attended to at popular rates, and there's always a dash of ballet to be had in the big movie emporiums.

But opera fans—visiting and native both—are still being left out in the cold, or is it the heat?

---

150 Music Students Stay at Bonsal 30-Room Mansion

LENOX—One hundred fifty Berkshire Music Center students now are quartered at the 30-room W. Roscoe Bonsal mansion at Lenox, bought by John B. and Ruth W. Tracy of Great Barrington from Arthur J. Martin of Plainville, Conn., for about $35,000. The place may be used as an inn after the close of the Tanglewood season, Mr. Tracy said.

Mr. Martin also sold to Trinity Episcopal Church at Lenox for about $900 a strip of land 50 feet by 300 feet, from Walker to Kemble Streets. The Tracys conduct the Barrington School for Girls.

Music Center Friends Now Total 730

Eagle July 3

Tanglewood Group Includes 400 Outside Berkshire

The Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood has reached a membership of 730. Starting with 330 permanent and summer residents of Berkshire County who subscribed before May 1 to the Berkshire Festival concerts, the organization has added 400 members from all parts of the country.

The original members are honorary, entitled to attend events at the school at no fee. All other members make a voluntary contribution to the support of the Center. Gifts vary according to purse and conscience of the donors.

Each Friend receives a list of the 22 musical events open to members of the organization in the six weeks of the Center, and is asked to check those he wishes to attend.

In the invitation to become a supporter of the Center by joining the Friends, Serge Koussevitzky, its director, and Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, list the sources of income of the school as "tuition from students who are able to pay, revenue from the Berkshire Festival concerts and gifts from those who elect to become Friends of the Berkshire Music Center."

Stating that the Center, inaugurated in 1940, is a realization of a long cherished plan, they assert that it was "made possible by a combination of fortunate circumstances—the gift of Tanglewood, the support of the Rockefeller Foundation in the first two seasons, and by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in the third season."

The next event open to the Friends of Tanglewood will be a concert by the advanced orchestra of the school Friday evening at 8.15. On Saturday afternoon at 3.30 there will be a choral concert.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 1 - 1946

KOUSSEVITZKY AT OPENING OF MUSIC SCHOOL

Director Asks Aid for Arts; 'Peter Grimes' Premiere August 6

Lenox, July 1—In as perfect Berkshire weather as anyone could ask, the Berkshire Music Center school was opened yesterday. The program, open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, was featured by an address by the Center's director, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, who again sounded his familiar call for more government aid for the arts.

Dr Koussevitzky also announced the American premiere of "Peter Grimes," the Benjamin Britten opera. It will be given Tuesday night, August 6, at Tanglewood with Eric Crozier, who staged the British premiere, assisting the Berkshire performance. The opera which won acclaim for its English composer last season will also be repeated in the music shed August 7 and 9, Dr Koussevitzky said.

Living Pulse of Art

"We artists are the living pulse of art," he said; "the state is the ground upon which art finds stability and security. Art needs the support of the state and demands a department of the fine arts. The state needs art for the purpose of fortifying and completing its present structure. In ignoring the arts the state will inevitably lose the sustaining interest and influence of the foremost minds and the creative spiritual forces of the nation."

Addressing the 400 students enroled Dr Koussevitzky said: "We shall again seek new answers to arising questions, a wider access to inexhaustible treasures of musical art, a higher vision of music as a profession, as a vocation and as a creative cultural force. In the progress of life the question of the creative vocation of man is also the question of a new consciousness.

The Concert-theater hall was nearly filled with an audience of 800. Henry B. Cabot, president of trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who presided, said that 33 states, Canada and a number of Central and South American countries are represented among the school registrants.

Aaron Copland, assistant director of the school welcomed the students who occupied seats in the center of the theater. A quartet, Richard Burgin, leader played the last two movements of the G minor Brahms quartet. Hugh Ross led a group of the students singing Randall Thompson's "Allelujah." Punch and ice cream were served by Curtis hotel in the gardens. The weather was perfect.

JEWISH WEEKLY TIMES July 3

MUSIC:

Moses Smith

A timely publication "The Tale of Tanglewood", by M. A. De Wolfe Howe (New York: The Vanguard Press, $2.00) serves to herald this summer's Berkshire Symphonic Festival and accompanying activity on the hallowed plot of land situated in the three towns of Lenox, Lee and Stockridge, Massachusetts.

SMITH

"Hallowed" is not too strong a word, as comes out in this little volume, which tells more fully than I have seen before, about Hawthorne's residence in a small cottage on the Tappan estate, for which it was he, apparently, who invented the name Tanglewood. That name was used for one of Hawthorne's later books — "Tanglewood Tales" — while two others were actually created there, "The House of Seven Gables" and "A Wonder-Book for Girls and Boys." At the Tanglewood cottage Hawthorne was visited by some of the great in American letters; and he got to know well Melville, who was staying in nearby Pittsfield.

The description of the relation between Melville and Hawthorne is, indeed, perhaps the most arresting portion of this volume, which, despite its brevity (the actual text is only 73 pages long), is not free from wordiness and rambling. The tale of the Festivals themselves is lightly sketched, perhaps because Mr. Howe thinks it is too fresh in people's minds. Still, if the tale is worth telling at all, it is worth telling more fully, more connectedly and more dramatically than it is told here. The drama, it is true, is in, about and by Serge Koussevitzky, whereas Mr. Howe's book is about a place. Yet a description of a place is likely to boil down to people who live there, how it affects them and they it, as Mr. Howe admits by implication in his considerable attention to Hawthorne and his friends.

An appendix lists all the Festival programs from its tentative beginnings in 1934, and it illustrates both the virtues and defects of Koussevitzky as a program-maker in these later years. He steadily increased the ration of new or unfamiliar music as he felt his audiences increase in sophistication. The more regrettable, then, his tendency, when it was a question of the so-called standard repertoire, to limit himself and his hearers to overplayed masterpieces. In the six previous summers of the Festivals dispensed by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from 1936 to 1941, a total of 42 programs, the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven appeared three times, and many other works were repeated or will have been repeated by the time the approaching Festival comes to an end.

In listing the 1946 programs, incidentally, Mr. Howe shrewdly qualifies them as "announced. Subject to change." And changed they have been, of course, since the first announcement. I sometimes suspect that Koussevitzky thinks there is a virtue in changing programs.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUL 3 - 1946

Tanglewood Has Initial Concert

Berkshire Wood Wind Ensemble Opens Musical Programs of Season at Music Center.

The Berkshire Wood Wind ensemble, composed of Boston Sym~~phony orchestra players under the~~ direction of Louis Speyer, last evening presented the first musical program of the 1946 Berkshire Music Center season at Tanglewood, Lenox.

Tanglewood, closed during the war years except for intimate Bach-Mozart concerts presented by some of the Boston Symphony group during the 1944 and 1945 summers, was formally reopened on Sunday with ceremonies in the concert hall where last evening's program initiated the season's musical offerings. The concert was one of four sponsored by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge foundation in the Library of Congress, and was open by invitation to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center who joined by contributing financially to the Center's work. The next Tanglewood activity will be a concert by the Music Center orchestra on Friday evening which also will be an invitation affair. The first public attraction will be a Bach-Mozart concert on the 13th.

Works performed under Mr. Speyer's direction last evening included Beethoven's Quintet in E flat for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, Randall Thompson's Suite for oboe, clarinet and viola, Hindemith's Chamber Music for Five Wood Wind instruments, a trio for piano, oboe and bassoon by Poulenc, Shapero's piano-sonata in A major No. 3, which the composer performed, and Rieti's Sonata for piano, flute, oboe and bassoon.

—The Berkshi

Chamb
Opens

First Progra
Found

By JAY C. R

The Berkshire
sented the first music concerts
Concert Hall at night through Sprague Coolidge
remaining three a
the next three T
Last night's conce
inauguration of t
mal program at T

It is the first ti
wood has been th
such a program,
struments employ composers selected
tion of the Cool
with the Berkshir
marks the unitin great educational country.

The artists of all members of t phony Orchestra a
as well. Louis S and director of
Wood Wind Ensem
gram which was e warding and stimu
assisted by George Viktor Polatschek,
mond Allard, ba
Valkenier, French
Franc, viola; and
as assisting pianist.

Spicy Program

Once the Beethov
flat, for piano, obo

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

JUL 3 - 1946

Famous Festival History Written

'Tale of Tanglewood' Based on Berkshire Music Events

Not quite 10 years ago, in 19
the Fourth Berkshire Sympho Festival presented the Bos
Symphony orchestra, directed Serge Koussevitzky, on the Tap estate in western Massachusetts, the world-famous Tanglewood c certs were inaugurated.

The short but rich history of Berkshire Music Festivals has be written by M. A. DeWolfe in a boo entitled, "The Tale of Tanglewood and released by the Vanguard Pre in New York. The book, which ca ries an introduction by Mr. Kou sevitzky, is beautifully illustrate and is obviously intended to serv as a souvenir for music lovers wh have made their pilgimage to th
American festival.

Hawthorne Named Estate.

In the middle of the 19th centur Nathaniel Hawthorne, living in cottage on the Tappan estate i Stockbridge, a town in the Berk shires, wrote his "Tanglewoo wood Tales" and gave the name o
Tanglewood to the estate.

In 1937, the Tappan heirs gave Tanglewood as a site for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival which, in 1934 and 1935 presented summer symphonies under the direction of Henry Hadley at Hanna Farm, and in 1936 presented the Boston Symphony orchestra at Holmwood, once the estate of George Westinghouse The festival was moved to Tanglewood, and the following year a huge music shed was constructed of steel and wood which not only afforded protection from the weather but also provided near-perfect acoustics The property now belongs to the Boston Symphony orchestra

Although its growth was limited by wartime travel restrictions, Tanglewood has become one of the great centers of the world of music In 1940, the Berkshire Music Center was opened, offering training to advanced students in music. As the festival centers of Europe, such as that at Salzburg, were discontinued Tanglewood increased in stature Approximately 90,000 persons attended the nine concerts in the final series in 1941 before the war interupted the festivals

Through the war, the music center for students has flourished and the concert series was again resumed this year with even larger audiences reported than ever before

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JUL 3 - 1946

Music

Impresarios Miss the Boat Shunning Summer Opera

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

For reasons best known to impresarios, grand opera here seems to be almost strictly a winter observance. In spring—and summer, too—the local fancy supposedly turns to symphonies and such.

The Metropolitan tried a spring season as an experiment and then abandoned it. Alfredo Salmaggi, of course, will brave any kind of weather to hammer home his pet gospel.

Then the Stadium usually comes along with a handful of performances, and if you watch the music calendars carefully you'll probably find occasional operas listed up around West 86th St. and other points north.

Only Sure in Cold.

On the whole, opera seems to wilt here in any kind of weather but freezing. Or so the impresarios think. Put on a "La Boheme" or "Traviata" at the Stadium and all New York is ready to trek up to the Lewisohn Stadium on any night but a wet one.

I would say New York's summer public is athirst for good opera, but finds scant means of getting it without long trips over land or sea. This might be looked into.

An odd feature of the music setup here is that opera personnel marches out of town in a body the moment the subscription season ends. The remainder of the Western Hemisphere can have opera in May, June and July, but not New York.

Europe never used to pass a summer without opera going full blast within short railroad reach of wherever you might be. Many festivals concentrated on opera, and some are already going back to prewar repertories.

But for New Yorkers late spring and summer are a time for orchestras. Bands and symphonic units begin spouting everywhere, and you can even run into chamber music, if you look hard. But opera? Well, you might try Mexico City or Rio.

Opera Could Succeed.

Some smart impresario is missing a good trick in not building a second Berkshire Festival devoted exclusively to grand opera. Even repertory light opera might be included for comic relief.

My hunch is New Yorkers would flock just as readily to high class summer opera as they do to symphonics in the Berkshire hills. With present facilities and the war's changes, we can build a super-Salzburg of opera.

Of course, the warm city weather is supposed to make opera production a slow and messy business, unless given at night in the cool outdoors, where there is a risk of rain. Air conditioning ought to answer that, just as it answered some of Broadway's problems.

I see no real reason why outside companies, even foreign ones, couldn't come into a properly air-cooled Metropolitan in the summer months. Or, why the Metropolitan troupe itself couldn't linger a while longer, say into late spring.

Besides, New York is a thriving tourist center in the summer months, or at any time during the year, for that matter. Play and show-minded outsiders find what they need, and so do the movie addicts.

Hinterlanders also find their symphonic needs attended to at popular rates, and there's always a dash of ballet to be had in the big movie emporiums.

But opera fans—visiting and native both—are still being left out in the cold, or is it the heat?

---

150 Music Students Stay at Bonsal 30-Room Mansion

LENOX—One hundred fifty Berkshire Music Center students now are quartered at the 30-room W. Roscoe Bonsal mansion at Lenox, bought by John B. and Ruth W. Tracy of Great Barrington from Arthur J. Martin of Plainville, Conn., for about $35,000. The place may be used as an inn after the close of the Tanglewood season, Mr. Tracy said.

Mr. Martin also sold to Trinity Episcopal Church at Lenox for about $900 a strip of land 50 feet by 300 feet, from Walker to Kemble Streets. The Tracys conduct the Barrington School for Girls.

Music Center Friends Now Total 730

Eagle July 3

Tanglewood Group Includes 400 Outside Berkshire

The Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood has reached a membership of 730. Starting with 330 permanent and summer residents of Berkshire County who subscribed before May 1 to the Berkshire Festival concerts, the organization has added 400 members from all parts of the country.

The original members are honorary, entitled to attend events at the school at no fee. All other members make a voluntary contribution to the support of the Center. Gifts vary according to purse and conscience of the donors.

Each Friend receives a list of the 22 musical events open to members of the organization in the six weeks of the Center, and is asked to check those he wishes to attend.

In the invitation to become a supporter of the Center by joining the Friends, Serge Koussevitzky, its director, and Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, list the sources of income of the school as "tuition from students who are able to pay, revenue from the Berkshire Festival concerts and gifts from those who elect to become Friends of the Berkshire Music Center."

Stating that the Center, inaugurated in 1940, is a realization of a long cherished plan, they assert that it was "made possible by a combination of fortunate circumstances—the gift of Tanglewood, the support of the Rockefeller Foundation in the first two seasons, and by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in the third season."

The next event open to the Friends of Tanglewood will be a concert by the advanced orchestra of the school Friday evening at 8.15. On Saturday afternoon at 3.30 there will be a choral concert.

…ESTER, N. H.
…EADER

…-1946

…us Festival …y Written
…f Tanglewood' …on Berkshire …Events

10 years ago, in 193
Berkshire Symphon presented the Bosto orchestra, directed
…vitzky, on the Tappa
…stern Massachusetts, a famous Tanglewood co inaugurated.
but rich history of t
Music Festivals has be
M. A. DeWolfe in a boo
he Tale of Tanglewood d by the Vanguard Pre
k. The book, which ca roduction by Mr. Kou beautifully illustrate ously intended to serv ir for music lovers wh their pilgimage to th estival.

orne Named Estate.

iddle of the 19th centur Hawthorne, living in the Tappan estate i a town in the Berk te, his "Tanglewood and gave the name of
to the estate.
the Tappan heirs gave as a site for the Berkhonic Festival which, in 35 presented summer under the direction of ey at Hanna Farm, and sented the Boston Symstra at Holmwood, once f George Westinghouse was moved to Tanglee following year a huge was constructed of steel which not only afforded rom the weather but d near-perfect acoustics ty now belongs to the phony orchestra.
its growth was limited
e travel restrictions.
has become one of the s of the world of music
Berkshire Music Center offering training to adents in music. As the ters of Europe, such as burg, were discontinued increased in stature.
ely 90,000 persons at-nine concerts in the in 1941 before the war he festivals.
he war, the music center has flourished. and the es, was again resum
th even larger audien n ever before.

2—The Berkshire County Eagle, Wednesday, July 3, 1946 ★★

Chamber Music Concert Opens Tanglewood Season

First of Series of Four Tuesday Night Programs Presented by Coolidge Foundation and Berkshire Music Center

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The Berkshire Music Center presented the first of four chamber music concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood last night through the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation. The remaining three are to be given on the next three Tuesday evenings. Last night's concert was really the inauguration of this season's formal program at Tanglewood.

It is the first time that Tanglewood has been the scene of just such a program, both in the instruments employed and in the composers selected. The co-operation of the Coolidge Foundation with the Berkshire Music Center marks the uniting of two of the great educational forces in the country.

The artists of the evening are all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Center as well. Louis Speyer as oboist and director of the Berkshire Wood Wind Ensemble chose a program which was exceptionally rewarding and stimulating. He was assisted by George Madsen, flute; Viktor Polatschek, clarinet; Raymond Allard, bassoon; William Valkenier, French horn; Jean LeFranc, viola; and Bernard Zighera as assisting pianist.

Spicy Program

Once the Beethoven quintet in E flat, for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon was past, the evening settled down to genuinely spicy musical interest. A suite for oboe, clarinet, and viola by Randall Thompson is an amazingly successful work. For anyone who has ever wondered what to do with a good theme, once he gets it, this is an example of a master's work. Whether to use a melody for a voice, an instrument or an ensemble has always been one of the greatest problems and decisions a composer has to make. Beethoven tried the quintet with which the program opened a couple of ways. Harold Shapero, who played his own piano sonata, in A major, No. 3, later on this program, may well consider using his material in a medium other than the keyboard, for certainly there are possibilities, notably in the two middle movements, for more effective expression than he was able to convey on the piano. But, to return to the Thompson trio, the five short movements are consistently well-knit, integral units, and the combination of timbres is surprisingly beautiful. Due credit should be granted Speyer, Polatschek and Lefranc, but, primarily, the composer achieved his success by a judicious use of the instruments. The viola plays almost completely in the lower registers to form a perfectly satisfying tonal balance with the two wood winds. The tone produced by the oboe and clarinet was of such a sensitive nature that the ensemble was as much a personal triumph for the artists as for the composer.

Hindemith Work Presented

The Hindemith "Chamber Music for Five Wind Instruments," Opus 24, No. 2, is also a free-flowing natural and happy inspiration. The addition of a horn to the wood wind quartet injects an ingredient which indeed completes the recipe. There was little, possibly too little, delay between movements. Wind instruments players at most have to adjust reeds or pull out valves so that they are immediately ready to go on at the close of each movement, so that they sometimes hasten too swiftly into the succeeding and varying mood, much as some broadcasting stations follow the final resounding wallop of the appasionata movement of a symphony with the dulcet strains of a following movement without a break. String ensembles stop to tune, and to rest. The Berkshire Wood Wind Ensemble might avail themselves of that bit of repose and poise.

After intermission came a Poulenc trio for piano, oboe and bassoon which maintained the vivid pulse of the evening. Mr. Zighera injected an elan into the final rondo which fairly lifted it into space. The Shapero piano sonata consists of four short movements, none of which is long enough to allow development. There is substance to each movement and only rarely is it reminiscent of an established style. It is not convincingly piano music, however. Possibly we were influenced to this opinion by its juxtaposition amidst an otherwise completely ensemble list, but we could not help feeling that the transposition to other instruments might benefit the material.

Rieti's sonata for piano, flute, oboe, and bassoon, is amusing, but it is also tawdry, and as music was the least worthy.

Mr. Speyer came forward at the close of the program to greet Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge who was in the audience and she was accorded an enthusiastic demonstration of grateful homage for the great addition she has provided for this year's magnificent season at Tanglewood.

Berkshire Courier
July 3

Koussevitzky Opens Tanglewood School

"Peter Grimes" Will Make American Debut Here

Composer and Director of Opera Are Coming From London for Three Performances. — Symphony and Chamber Music Programs for the Summer Are Announced.

Opening the Berkshire Music Center school at Tanglewood, Lenox, on Sunday afternoon before an audience of students and music lovers estimated to number 800, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the school and conductor of the Boston Symphony, announced that the first American performance of the new opera, "Peter Grimes," will be given at Tanglewood Tuesday night, August 6. It also will be presented in the music shed August 7 and 9. Benjamin Britten, composer of the opera, which has been performed in London, will be present for the opening and Eric Crozier is coming from London to handle the stage direction, Dr. Koussevitzky said.

The conductor suggested that it is time for our government to subsidize the arts, especially music. He declared "we artists are the living pulse of art and the state is the ground upon which art finds stability and security. Art needs the support of the state and demands a department of the fine arts. The state needs art for the purpose of fortifying and completing its present structure. In ignoring the arts the state will inevitably lose the sustaining interest and influence of the foremost minds and the creative spiritual forces of the nation."

Speaking directly to the 400 students enrolled, Dr. Koussevitzky said they would again seek "a higher vision of music as a profession, as a vocation and as a creative cultural force." Henry B. Cabot, president of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who presided, reported that 33 states, Canada and a number of Central and South American countries are represented among those registered at the school.

The programs for the 17 concerts to be given this summer at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and by concert groups were announced this week.

The Berkshire Festival proper, consisting of nine concerts to be given in the music shed under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction between July 25 and August 11, has already been announced and will include the new Ninth Symphony of Shostakovitch, which Dr. Koussevitzky has just received from Russia and which will have its first American performance at the festival's opening.

Two Bach-Mozart programs, each repeated, will be given by members of the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in the theatre concert hall July 13-14 and July 20-21. The first program will consist of Mozart's Symphony in b flat, No. 33, the adagio from the string quintet in G minor, the Third and Fifth Brandenburg Concertos by Bach, and Mozart's Wind Serenade in b flat, K. 361. The second program will consist of Bach's Second Brandenburg Concerto and Fourth Suite, Mozart's Violin Concerto in A major, with William Kroll as soloist, and the same composer's "Jupiter" symphony.

Four chamber music concerts will be given on four Tuesday evenings in the same auditorium under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation. At the first, on July 2, the Berkshire Wood Wind Ensemble presented Quintets by Beethoven and Hindemith, trios by Randall Thompson and Shapero, a quartet sonata by Rieti, and a trio by Poulenc.

On July 9 the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, Alfred Zighera, director, will give a program for viols and harpsichord, with music by Telemann, Bach, Gibbons, D. Scarlatti, Rameau, Handel and Couperin.

On July 16, the Kroll Quartet will present Beethoven's Quartet in F minor, op. 95, Prokofieff's Second Quartet, Op. 92, and Haydn's Quartet in D major, op. 64, No. 5.

On July 23 the Berkshire Chamber Orchestra, under the direction of Louis Speyer, will present a cantata, "The Birth of Beauty," by Lourie in its first American performance, and the first performance of Malipiero's "Seven Delights of Love." Both pieces are for voices with chamber orchestra. Valentina Vishnevska will appear as soloist. The program will also include Copeland's Sextet and Ibert's "Divertissement."

Through the six weeks' session of the Berkshire Music Center, Serge Koussevitzky, director, (July 1-August 11), student groups will give many chamber, orchestra and choral concerts. All school performances, as well as the Tuesday chamber concerts, will be open by invitation to the friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JUL 2 - 1946

Of Music and Musicians

The July issue of "Britain Today" has two articles of particular interest to musicians—the editorial called a "New Social Service" and the article "State Aid for the Arts" by Mary Glasgow, secretary-general of the Arts Council of Great Britain.

Miss Glasgow's article tells of the structure of the arts council, which is an outgrowth of the CEMA or Council for the Encouragement of Music and the Arts—a wartime project.

The editorial refers to the new arts council and compares it to the British Council, which is also supported by the State but whose work is mainly concerned with friends of Britain overseas.

Brief quotes from the editorial:

"The Arts Council directly ministers to pleasure, the kind of pleasure which can be had by access to art, music, drama and the like.

"Why, it may be asked, should the state concern itself with such matters, and not leave the task to individuals? The answer, of course is, that the individual in this sphere always comes first, but that in the modern world he cannot do all that is required unless the state provides helpful conditions.

"The state cannot stand aside and wash its hands of all responsibility in the sphere of culture. It ought never to dictate ideas; never be a moral or aesthetic censor; but it is just as much its duty to provide conditions in which the ordinary citizen can have spiritual enjoyment as to provide conditions in which he may be physically nourished and housed.

"These two conceptions, I think, of what is fundamentally the same principle of state responsibility have led to the setting up of the British council, for external relations, and the Arts Council of Great Britain, for our internal needs. They are products of the new conception of democracy, requiring that the state can no longer turn its back upon the problem of spiritual nourishment at home or be indifferent to the spiritual bonds by which alone many nations, in the coming age, can be brought nearer together. But so far as the British council is concerned, one thing is urgently needed for the completion of its usefulness—that similar bodies should be set up by all countries, operating here and everywhere, and in such a way that the representatives of all would feel themselves to be colleagues."

In referring to the CEMA or the wartime group Miss Glasgow states:

"Money was given to the national orchestras, enabling them to tour new places; to local music or dramatic societies, making it possible for them to continue their activities under the stress of reduced membership, lack of transport and the first winter blackout; and as time went on, to numbers of theater, opera and ballet companies, led by famous figures who saw in this field of pioneer performing both a duty and an opportunity."

Of the new council she says:

"The over-riding aim of the arts council is to work through existing independent organizations wherever these can be found. It is always the council's object to discover centers of local initiative and having found them, use them to the full.

"The problem now before the arts council is how to recognize and select the projects which it intends to support. The method of selection is arbitrary. It is never the council's way to attempt an even distribution of assistance, but rather to help particular ventures, chosen for their potential value. Once given, the money granted is an earnest of the council's hope that the body receiving it will prosper, become self-supporting and leave the field to others who will benefit it in the same way.

"'Fair' distribution of funds is probably impossible for the arts in any case. Local conditions vary almost infinitely, and so does the nature of the many artistic schemes which come before the council with applications for support.

"A high standard of artistry is an essential part of the council's doctrine. So is variety of achievement.

"The arts council, while it uses public money, is not a government department. Its staff are not civil servants and the 13 councillors are unpaid individuals, chosen for their personal distinction and not as representing any outside interest. They include, by chance, two college principals, two members of parliament, a composer, an actor, a playwright and a newspaper editor.

"On the council's staff are three specialist directors, one for music, one for drama and one for the visual arts. They are full-time, salaried officers, appointed for their expert, professional knowledge, and they are responsible for directing policy in their different fields."

Mentioned in the article as councillors are Dr. Ralph Vaughan Williams, Sir Kenneth Clark, Sir Lewis Casson and Ivor Brown.

The Berkshire Music center opened at Tanglewood Sunday. Faculty members of the center have been announced by Serge Koussevitzky, director, and Aaron Copland, assistant director. The orchestral conducting will be under the direct supervision of Dr. Koussevitzky with Richard Burgin, Stanley Chapple and Leonard Bernstein assisting.

Gregor Piatigorsky is in charge of the department of chamber music. Aaron Copland and Bohuslav Martinu head the classes in composition. Opera is under the direction of Herbert Graf, Boris Goldovsky and Richard Rychtarik. Hugh Ross and Robert Shaw are in charge of the choral work; Katherine Wolf is teaching solfege and Irving Fine, harmony.

Members of the Boston Symphony orchestra who make up the instrumental faculty include the violinists Richard Burgin, Julius Theodorowicz, Alfred Krips, Vladimir Resnikoff, Einar Hansen and Clarence Knudson; violists Jean Lafranc, Georges Fourel and Eugen Lehner; violoncellists Jean Bedetti and Gaston Dufresne; flutists George Laurent and George Madsen, and oboist Fernand Gillet.

Also English horn player Louis Speyer; clarinetist, Victor Polatschek; bass clarinetist, Rosario Mazzeo; bassoonist, Raymond Allard; horn players, Willem Valkenier and Walter Macdonald; trumpet players, George Mager and Marcel Lafosse; trombonist, Jacob Raichman; harpist, Bernard Zighera; timpanist, Roman Szulc; pianist, Lukas Foss, and organist, E. Power Biggs.

The first of the four chamber music concerts at Tanglewood will be presented tonight by members of the Berkshire Wood Wind ensemble under the direction of Louis Speyer.

The program will include the Beethoven Quintet in E flat for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, opus 16; Randall Thompson's Suite for oboe, clarinet and viola; Hindemith's "Chamber Music for Five Wind Instruments" (flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon), opus 24, number 2; the Poulenc "Trio" for piano, oboe and bassoon; Shapero's "Piano Sonata in A major," number 3 with the composer performing; and the Rieti "Sonata" for piano, flute, oboe and bassoon.

On Friday evening the Berkshire Music Center orchestra of department II, will give a concert. These concerts are open to friends of the Berkshire Music center by invitation.

F. Charles Adler, director of the Saratoga Spa Musical festival which will open at the state reservation in September, recently received a letter of commendation for the project from Gov. Thomas E. Dewey. In part the letter reads

"It is a great pleasure to know that you are reviving the Saratoga Spa Music festival at the state reservation in September. This festival is a genuine contribution to the musical and artistic wealth of the state of New York. It is gratifying to note that you are devoting a large part of your program to the encouragement of new composers and are thus enabling the latent talent of America to receive a hearing.

"I have always felt that Saratoga is an ideal setting for a cultural center rivaling the old world Spas. Nature has richly endowed Saratoga with health-giving mineral springs, a fine climate and beautiful scenery. Through the Saratoga Springs authority the state of New York is endeavoring to preserve and utilize these gifts for the benefit of the public."

Henry T. Moore is serving as honorary chairman of the festival, Carl R. Comstock as chairman and Douglas H. Williams as treasurer. Others on the board of directors are William E. Benton, Spencer B. Eddy, Ralph J. Ellsworth, Irving I. Goldsmith, Jerome S. Hess, Clarence H. Knapp, Dudley G. Lester, Addison Mallery, Edgar D. Starbuck Jr. and Monty Woolley.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

JUL 5 1946

Jefferson's Message Vitalized In Victor's 'Song Of Freedom'

By Corbin Patrick

QUITE in keeping with the spirit of the holiday just observed is the feature of Victor's July release—a recording of Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom" as presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Harvard Glee Club under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

"The Song of Freedom" is a setting of four passages from the writings of Thomas Jefferson, a paean for men's chorus and orchestra first performed in 1943 at the University of Virginia—founded by Jefferson—where Thompson now teaches.

THE PATRIOTIC nature of the paean is indicted by the title of its four movements—"The God Who Gave Us Life Gave Us Liberty," "We Have Counted the Cost of This Great Contest," "We Fight Not For Glory Or for Conquest," and "I Shall Not Die Without a Hope That Light and Liberty Are On Steady Adance."

Thompson has given the inspired, still meaningful words of the philosopher President a simple, dignified and effective choral treatment. The work, played frequently to the armed forces overseas by short wave broadcast during the war, finds a sympathetic interpreter in Koussevitzky and more than adequate musical forces in the Boston and Harvard collaborators. There are three large discs in the set.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS

JUL 6 - 1946

Shostakovich Premiere . . . The long-awaited hearing of Shostakovich's latest symphony, the Ninth, the most important music event of the current season, will be brought to American radio listeners for the first time by WJZ and the American Broadcasting Co. Saturday, Aug. 10, at 9:30 P. M. The work will be performed by the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, at the ~~Berkshire~~ Music Festival. Premiered Nov. 3, 1945, over Radio Moscow, the score, which takes 25 minutes to play, has not been heard outside of Russia.

* *

Kilocycling . . . Kay Kyser, a proud new papa, is taking a seven-week vacation so he can get acquainted with the infant. Art Linkletter takes over during Kay's baby-sitting stint. Mrs. Kyser is Georgia Carroll, formel model and singer with the Kyser gang . . . Johnny Mercer unveils his newest tune, "My Sugar Is So Refined," on the Benny Goodman show Monday night at 9:30 over WEAF . . . Ralph Edwards signs off "Truth or Consequences" tonight, the show returning to the air Sept. 7.

ANSONIA, CONN.
SENTINEL

JUL 6 - 1946

Reading and Writing

By W. G. ROGERS.

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD: SCENE OF THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVALS, by M. A. ~~DeWolfe Howe~~, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard).

Tanglewood from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and a Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire symphonic festivals and music center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitly greater than the similarity in the titled would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield-Stockbridge-Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful music shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, only 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD

JUL 6 1946

Boston 'Pops' To Broadcast Outdoor Concert

Microphones of the American Broadcasting Company will move from Symphony hall for the first time since last October, when the concert of the Boston Pops orchestra at the Esplanade by the Charles river is broadcast over Radio Station KWNO today.

Arthur Fiedler will make his last appearance of the summer season to conduct the open-air program, which will be heard from 7:30 to 8:30 p. m.

The following Saturday night, ABC will move to Tanglewood where the Berkshire festival program will be broadcast. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, having completed the first part of his vacation, will return to the podium to conduct an ensemble of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Both the Bach-Mozart series and the Festival Concerts will be broadcast.

For the Esplanade concert tonight, Fiedler has chosen the following: "Sleepers Awake," from Canta No. 140 by Bach; "Symphony No. 8," by Beethoven; "Slavonic Dance in A-Flat," by Dvorak, and "Marche Slav," by Tchaikovsky.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

JUL 6 - 1946

Microphones of the American Broadcasting Company will move from Symphony Hall for the first time since last October, when the concert of the Boston Pops Orchestra at the Esplanade by the Charles River is broadcast over Station WATR-WJZ tonight Arthur Fiedler will make his last appearance of the summer season to conduct the program which will be heard from 9:30 to 10:30 P. M., EDT.

The following Saturday night, ABC will move to Tanglewood where the Berkshire Festival programs will be broadcast. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, having completed the first part of his vacation, will return to the podium to conduct an ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Both the Bach-Mozart series and the festival concerts will be broadcast.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

JUL 6 - 1946

Literary GUIDEPOST

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD: SCENE OF THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVALS, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard)

~~TANGLEWOOD~~ from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It is time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield-Stockbridge-Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, only 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

JUL 7 - 1946

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD SCENE OF THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVALS, by M. A. ~~DeWolfe Howe~~, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard). Tanglewood from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs.

Shed at Tanglewood Reopens With Student Performance

The wartime wraps were removed from the Shed at Tanglewood last night for the first concert by the advanced student orchestra under four conductors studying with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Berkshire Music Center. There was an audience of well over a thousand including the 400 students and faculty of the Center.

Gerard Samuel of New York had the honor of opening the program, conducting the orchestra through Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D Major. Peter Mennin of Erie, Pa., followed with his own composition, "Folk Overture." Samuel Lipkin of Detroit, Mich., led the orchestra through the Sibelius Symphony No. 5 in E Flat and Eleazar Carvalho of Brazil closed the program with Rimsky Korsakoff's, "The Russian Easter."

There was applause for all four but it was more prolonged for Lipkin and Carvalho. Dr. Koussevitzky and his assistant, Stanley Chapple and Gregor Piatigorsky, seated near the front listened intently to the entire performance, beaming or frowning their reactions. The same orchestra will perform next Friday evening at 8.15.

Other Music Center events next week open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center include: Thursday at 8.15, chamber music and madrigals; Saturday afternoon at 3.30, choral concert.

Tuesday night comes the second chamber music concert in the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge series and Saturday night will be the opening Bach-Mozart series.

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD

JUL 6 1946

Notables Set For 'Carnegie Hall'

By DOROTHY MANNERS
International News Staff Writer

HOLLYWOOD, Cal.—The most pretentious Hollywood movie ever to be filmed away from Hollywood is "Carnegie Hall," with producers Bill Le Baron and Boris Morros announcing that their technicolor extravaganza gets going in New York on Aug. 5.

LeBaron and Morros have been working for weeks on the headaches presented by such an extensive, and expensive production away from the home base and its expert technicians. But problems or no problems—they've decided that the logical place to shoot "Carnegie Hall" is in Carnegie Hall.

Jascha Heifetz, Walter Bruno, the New York Philharmonic orchestra, the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Rise Stevens are the latest artists to be added to the cast of great musicians already contracted for this picture. Previously set are Lily Pons, Arthur Rubenstein and the Vatican choir. Of course, there is a full cast of Hollywood players, yet to be announced, who will take the trip to New York to carry on the romantic theme.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

JUL 6 1946

The famous Berkshire Music Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, which Olin Downes praised so highly in his visit here, opens at Tanglewood, of Nathaniel Hawthorne fame, July 25, with the first American performance of the Shostakovich Ninth Symphony. Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," commissioned by Mr. Koussevitzky, will be given Aug. 6, 7 and 9, with Leonard Bernstein conducting.

SHAMOKIN, PA.
NEWS-DISPATCH

JUL 6 - 1946

BOSTON PLANS PRE-WAR TYPE MUSIC FESTIVAL

Annual Berkshire Event Will Extend Over Three Weekends

LENOX, Mass. (U.P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its annual Berkshire music festival July 25 in gala prewar style at Tanglewood, in the hills of western Massachusetts.

A series of nine concerts extending over three weekends will be given in a bucolic setting. Thousands of music lovers from every corner of the nation are expected to attend. Some will have seats in the music shed. The others sprawl helter-skelter on the lawns of the rambling 200-acre estate—are out of luck if it rains.

The program begins and ends with Beethoven symphonies. However, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has included the works of modern composers, among whom are Rachmaninoff, Copland, Shostakovitch and Martinu.

Before the opening of the festival, the orchestra under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky will give a series of four chamber music concerts comprised solely of the music of Bach and Mozart. Longtime favorites, including Bach's Brandenburg Concerto and Mozart's Jupiter Symphony, are on the program.

The festivals have been held annually since their inauguration in 1934. Each time they draw a bigger crowd. The Tanglewood estate, where once Nathaniel Hawthorne lived and wrote "Tanglewood Tales," was presented to the symphony orchestra in 1936 by Mrs. Andres Hepburn and her aunt, Miss Mary A Tappan. The shed was built in 1938. A crowd of 95,000 persons gathered for the series of concerts in 1941.

Nearly a month before the opening of the festival the Berkshire music center opens for six weeks beginning July 1. Unique in purpose the school gives young musicians a chance to polish their performance before entering the professional fields.

The faculty of the school is composed of the nation's big names in music, including composer Leonard Bernstein, Gregor Piatigorsky, Aaron Copland and opera expert Boris Goldovsky.

The school was closed during the war, but now has accepted more than 300 students in various departments such as composition, instrumentation, conducting, and opera. The opera department plans a performance of Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," a piece that was composed for Tanglewood and produced in England last summer.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS REGISTER

JUL 7 - 1946

HEELING NEW

New Records

Reviewed By
Paul N. Elbin

THE TESTAMENT OF FREEDO

Complaints that the record co panies are issuing only such bes ellers as the famous fifth sy phonies of Beethoven, Dvorak, an Tschaikowsky, are not altogethe ustified. Aaron Copeland's "A palachian Spring" in May and no n July, Randall Thompson's "Th Testament of Freedom" (RCA V or, 1054—three 12-inch record ndicate an interest in mode American music not dictated irely by the well known profit
ive. Thanks to RCA Victor hese recent nods to living comp rs!

"The Testament of Freedom" musical setting for men's chor nd orchestra of four quotatio from the writings of Thomas J ferson. My only regret conce ng this excellent album is that was not recorded and relea three years ago when the mu was first performed; for "The T tament of Freedom" is definite wartime composition. The Jef sonian quotations are not the that would be chosen to giv well-balanced conception of democratic ideology of this great American. Written for most part in 1774 and 1775 quotations have to do with the tice of the war against Engla
"We fight not for glory or for co quest. . . . Our cause is jus
These are the core of the sen ment.

It is not surprising to learn the original performance at University of Virginia was reco ed and sent by short wave to o armed forces overseas. Notice th striking fitness of Jefferson words as applied to our war again Hitlerism: ". . . even should th cloud of barbarism and despotis again obscure the science and li ertines of Europe, this country r mains to preserve and restore lig and liberty to them." "The Testa ment of Freedom" should hav been sung almost daily throughou this land from the date of its com pletion in 1942 until V-E day.

To be sure, this album is mor than a souvenir of World War I
There is a lasting patriotic cha

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO

JUL 6 - 1946

hosty's 9th Gets Here for July Pre

NEW YORK, June 29.—Am eds' subsidiary handling all ssian music in the United S is week had score of Sho ch's 9th Symphony flown mpth was dubbed on to mic d microfilm print was flown Preem Yank performance fo nth will be that given by the n Symphony at Tanglewood, M ly 25. Boston longhair ork course, be led by Kou ith the longhair world gettin t up over Shostakovitch's ece, and The Gypsy still hold ip on the No. 1 slot in the oll of Hits, Leeds is feeling cky. Just sitting back now aiting for Atomic Power to blo d off folk best seller lists.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS REGISTER

JUL 7 - 1946

WHEELING NEWS

New Records
Reviewed By
Paul N. Elbin

THE TESTAMENT OF FREEDOM'

Complaints that the record companies are issuing only such best-sellers as the famous fifth symphonies of Beethoven, Dvorak, and Tschaikowsky, are not altogether justified. Aaron Copeland's "Appalachian Spring" in May and now in July, Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom" (RCA Victor. 1054—three 12-inch records) indicate an interest in modern American music not dictated entirely by the well known profit motive. Thanks to RCA Victor for these recent nods to living composers!

"The Testament of Freedom" is a musical setting for men's chorus and orchestra of four quotations from the writings of Thomas Jefferson. My only regret concerning this excellent album is that it was not recorded and released three years ago when the music was first performed; for "The Testament of Freedom" is definitely a wartime composition. The Jeffersonian quotations are not the ones that would be chosen to give a well-balanced conception of the democratic ideology of this truly great American. Written for the most part in 1774 and 1775, the quotations have to do with the justice of the war against England. "We fight not for glory or for conquest. . . . Our cause is just." These are the core of the sentiment.

It is not surprising to learn that the original performance at the University of Virginia was recorded and sent by short wave to our armed forces overseas. Notice the striking fitness of Jefferson's words as applied to our war against Hitlerism: ". . . even should the cloud of barbarism and despotism again obscure the science and libertines of Europe, this country remains to preserve and restore light and liberty to them." "The Testament of Freedom" should have been sung almost daily throughout this land from the date of its completion in 1942 until V-E day.

To be sure, this album is more than a souvenir of World War II. There is a lasting patriotic challenge in Randall Thompson's choice of Jefferson's words and in the music with which he has so appropriately clothed them. The composition opens with a stirring setting of thees timeless lines, "The God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time; the hand of force may destroy but cannot disjoin them." With flourish of trumpets, almost in "Pomp and Circumstance" style, Thompson drives this declaration into the consciousness of those who listen. He returns to it after his four movements, using it as an impressive, climactic coda.

Following the anthem-like opening movement, Thompson employs choral speaking, an effective technique for the recitation of 21[illegible] words of prose in one movement (two record sides.) This second movement is somewhat in the style of the popular "Ballad for Americans"; at times its simplicity suggests plain song. In distinct contrast the third movement is rapid in tempo, bridging effectively the spirit of the second and fourth movements. The fourth and closing movement is elegiac in character a tribute to Jefferson during 1943—the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

The composer, Randall Thompson, now in his 48th year, deserves to be called one of our leading contemporary American composers. Conservative, yet at home in twentieth century music he writes music of simplicity and sincerity. The Victor engineers have given 'The Testament of Freedom" good treatment. The orchestra is the Boston Symphony Koussevitsky conducting, while the chorus is the Harvard Glee Club directed by C. Wallace Woodworth. The work as performed is a credit to these two great musical organizations.

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD

JUL 7 1946

Recordings In Review

RANDALL THOMPSON, The Testament of Freedom (a setting of four passages from the writings of Thomas Jefferson), Boston Symphony with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and Harvard Glee culb, G. Wallace Bloodworth conducting. Victor album 11-9179, three 12-inch records.

Regretfully we state that this sort of production leaves us totally unimpressed—nay, even bored—for we see no reason for anyone's setting this sort of hard-to-grasp prose to music at all. Just the idea of doing it is to us stuffy and provoking.

Not that the setting isn't made by a competent man of great choral experience, or that the Harvard boys don't sing it well. It is, and they do. The music is even changeful enough to be classed as fairly interesting. But the whole thing fails to jell, in our opinion. It's a novelty, and one hearing is plenty. The Boston Symphony attacks it with sufficient vigor and precision, though, to make it stirring in spots.

THE RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM, recited by Ralph Bellamy, accompanied by Victor Chamber orchestra, Macklin Marrow conducting. Victor album 11-9184, two 12-inch records.

The Rubaiyat read out loud, in Hollywood style, is to us a mere nuisance, and when it is backgrounded by a quantity of twiddling music that's supposed to sound oriental, it's worse than that.

INTERNATIONAL NIGHT, Henri Rene and his Musette orchestra, Victor album 25-0062, three 10-inch records.

This is excellent cafe music, excitingly played, full of verve and dash. Six well-known classics are given the cafe twist by Henri Rene—including Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Mozart's Turkish Rondo, the Capriccio Italienne of Tchaikowsky, and Chopin's Mazurka in D major. A little of this goes a long way, but if you're in the mood it's wonderful.

NEW VICTOR singles: Debussy's "La Fille aux Cheveux de Lin" and Elgar, "Salut d'Amour," Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, with Adolph Baller at the piano, (10-1220)—nice, but without the expected rich Menuhin tone; Barroso, "Brazil," and Provost, "Intermezzo," Boston Pops orchestra, [redacted] Fiedler conducting (10-1219)—gay popular melodies, well turned out; "Drink To Me Only With Thine Eyes" and "In the Gloaming," sung by Robert Merrill, baritone (10-1218)—expressive tender singing of favorites it's nice to have on hand.—D. R.

COLUMBIA, S. C.
STATE

JUL 7 - 1946

Samuel Barber Wins Music Circle Prize

Samuel Barber won the annual testimonial of the music critics circle of New York for his concerto for violincello and orchestra, op. 22, called the American composition considered exceptional in its field and publicly performed for the first time in New York by the Boston symphony, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting and [redacted]ova as soloist.

President Miles Kastendieck said the circle also lauded David Diamond's "Rounds For String Orchestra' 'as deserving a place in symphony repertoires, and gave a special citation to Charles Ives' third symphony.

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.

JUL 6 - 1946

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

ON Victor's July list is a recording of Randall Thompson's "Testament of Freedom" made by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony and the Harvard Glee Club (Set 1054; $3.85). The work, composed in 1943 to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of Jefferson's birth, is a setting of four passages from his writings. Perhaps music could be written that would have an expressive relation to statements like "The God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time; the hand of force may destroy but cannot disjoin them," or "We have counted the cost of this contest, and find nothing so dreadful as voluntary slavery," or "Our cause is just. Our union is perfect. Our internal resources are great." But Thompson has not written it. Instead the words are fitted to a piece of patriotic musical oratory that involves them in moods, structural devices, and climaxes with which which they have no real relation; and the incongruous musical contexts rob the words of their own impressiveness and even make them ridiculous. The recorded sound of the performance is good.

It has been amazing to hear what popular pieces like the Overture to "Zampa" and Sousa's marches have sounded like when Toscanini has played them in recent years; and I once pointed out that a musically unsophisticated person listening to these performances of works that he knew well might be struck by the things that were different about them this time, and in this way might get an idea of the differences possible in performances, and of the particular qualities of Toscanini's performances, which previously he may have been inclined to think people only pretended to hear in order to show their superior understanding. Victor, which issued the performance of Waldteufel's "Skaters" Waltz last winter, now gives us a single record (11-9188; $1) with Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" and Strauss's "Tritsch-Tratsch" Polka, recorded by Toscanini with the N. B. C. Symphony. The first performance of the march three years ago that was put on an army V-disc was better (it had, for example, a delicious lightness and lilt in the contrasting soft part of the opening passage, a breadth in the concluding passage, that the present performance does not have), but the present one is exciting enough; and the verve, sharpness, and buoyancy of the polka make it a breath-taking delight. The recorded sound of the march hasn't all the brightness of that of the polka.

The result justifies Toscanini's playing of a popular waltz or march; but there is no such result to justify Eleanor Steber's application of her cultivated style to Hoagy Carmichael's "Star Dust" or even to "Summertime" from "Porgy and Bess" (11-9186; $1). The voice sounds lovely; and Robert Merrill's baritone is richly sonorous in "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes," which would seem to me to call for something else than the chiffon and rhinestone strings and harps and what not that swirl around the singing on a record (10-1218; $.75) that offers "In the Gloaming" on the reverse side. Stokowski's transcriptions of Tchaikovsky's "Solitude" and "Humoresque," which he has recorded with the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra (11-9187; $1), are something to skip. And the remaining items of this kind on Victor's July list can go without comment.

After my last article had gone to press I received from another reader—a Viennese now in this country—the letter he writes me when I express a low opinion of some highly regarded work or composer. Each time he rebukes and corrects me by quoting at me the all too familiar phrases of the official opinion that I have rejected; and his perplexity,

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 7 - 1946

Tanglewood Events

First Bach-Mozart Concert Next Week End

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct a small orchestra of Boston Symphony musicians in two Bach-Mozart programs during the next two week ends in the Berkshire Music Center's Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The program for next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, July 13-14, includes Bach's third and fifth Brandenburg Concertos and Mozart's symphony in B flat (K. 319), adagio from the G minor string quintet and Serenade for wind instruments in B flat (K. 361). The second program, on July 20 and 21, includes Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto, fourth suite, and Mozart's fifth violin concerto, with William Kroll as soloist, and "Jupiter" Symphony.

Dmitri Shostakovitch's ninth symphony, which has its American premiere in the Boston Symphony's first festival concert at Tanglewood on Thursday night, July 25, will be repeated in the festival concert of Saturday night, Aug. 11.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO

JUL 6 - 1946

Shosty's 9th Gets Here for July Preem

NEW YORK, June 29.—Am-Rus, Leeds' subsidiary handling all Soviet Russian music in the United States, this week had score of Shostakovitch's 9th Symphony flown over. Sympth was dubbed on to microfilm and microfilm print was flown here.

Preem Yank performance for the Ninth will be that given by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, Mass., July 25. Boston longhair ork will, of course, be led by Koussevitsky. With the longhair world getting all het up over Shostakovitch's new piece, and The Gypsy still holding its grip on the No. 1 slot in the Honor Roll of Hits, Leeds is feeling pretty cocky. Just sitting back now and waiting for Atomic Power to blow the lid off folk best seller lists.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

JUL 7 1946

Ninth Shostakovich Symphony Premiere

THE American radio premiere of Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony is set for the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast at 8:30 Saturday night, Aug. 10. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the work, which was played for the first time Nov. 3, 1945, on the Moscow radio station.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

JUL 7 1946

Barber's Concerto Wins Critics' Award

NEW YORK, July 6.—(AP)—Samuel Barber won the annual testimonial of the Music Critics Circle of New York for his concerto for violincello and orchestra, OP. 22, called the American composition considered exceptional in its field and publicly performed for the first time in this city. The Boston symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting and Raya Garbousova soloist, played it here in April.

President Hiles Kastendieck said the Circle also lauded David Diamond's "Rounds for String Orchestra" as deserving a place in symphony repertoires, and gave a special citation to Charles Ives' third symphony.

WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
PALM BEACH TIMES

JUL 7 - 1946

Samuel Barber won the annual testimonial of the music critics circle of New York for his concerto for violincello and orchestra, Op. 22, called the American composition considered exceptional in its field and publicly performed for the first time in this city. The Boston symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting and Raya Carbousova soloist, played it here in April.

President Miles Kastendieck said the circle also lauded David Diamond's "Rounds For String Orchestra" as deserving a place in symphony repertoires, and gave a special citation to Charles Ives' third symphony.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

JUL 7 1946

Harvard Glee Club, Bostonians Record 'Testament of Freedom'

By Col. L. R. Boals

A work of unusual interest is released by RCA Victor in its three-disk album DM-1054. It contains a recording of Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom," performed by the Harvard Glee Club and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The choral director of the Glee Club is G. Wallace Woodworth.

"The Testament of Freedom," inspired by the spirit and set to the words of Thomas Jefferson, was composed to commemorate the 200th anniversary of Jefferson's birth. Since 1941, Randall Thompson has been on the University of Virginia faculty. He holds a Master's degree from Harvard, an honorary doctorate from the University of Rochester, has received a number of fellowships, taught at Wellesley, lectured at Harvard, was on the music department faculty of the University of California, director of the Curtis Institute of Music at Philadelphia—an active life for a man of 47 years.

Thompson has made important contributions to American choral music. The keynote to his idiom is simplicity—a direct and expansive musical speech. In this work, the timelessness and universality of Jefferson's words have achieved, through the craftsmanship of Randall Thompson, a new and lasting grandeur. The Harvard Glee Club sings the music with fine spirit, and, of course, the great Boston Symphony plays magnificently. The recording is excellent and the surfaces very fine.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

JUL 6 1946

Tanglewood Festival Of Concerts to Begin

BOSTON, Mass., July 5.—Conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a Bach-Mozart program July 13 and 14 to open Tanglewood's five-week concert series. The program includes two Brandenburg Concertos of Bach, the Third in G Major for strings, and the Fifth in D Major for piano, flute and strings, and Mozart's Symphony No. 33 in B Flat Major (K-319).

INFORMATION OBSCURED

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NEWS-SENTINEL

JUL 7 - 1946

Plan for Listening—

Berkshire Festival, New Programs on Air

OPENING of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., appearance of more new summer replacement shows and time shifts for a number of old favorites are top notes on the week's radio plans.

First program for the annual Berkshire Festival will be a Bach-Mozart concert by me[redacted]phony Orchestra under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Size of the orchestra has been held within the limits of those for which Bach and Mozart originally wrote the numbers. Three soloists, Lukas Foss, pianist; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Georges Laurent, flutist, will participate in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D Minor." WBIR, 8:30 p. m. Saturday.

Milton Berle brings his new "Kiss and Make Up" program, at 8 p. m. Mondays, WNOX, featuring a "Court of Petty Grievances," with awards being made by a jury for the "litigants" who are heard on the court.

WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.
TWIN CITY SENTINEL

JUL 7 - 1946

Musical Notes

New York—Metropolitan Opera House had to close down for lack of German singers, and America remained in its usual barbaric stage of civilization, . . . so the German people believed during the war, says Captain Edward Kilenyi.

Pianist Kilenyi, who makes his first postwar appearance with the New York Philharmonic at the stadium next week, has just ended an army career with military intelligence and psychological warfare. By playing over Radio Luxembourg beamed to Germany, he helped persuade Germans of the existence of American music and musicians. He persuaded German orchestras to use scores by Allied composers.

He discovered that, while all Hitler's resources appeared to be devoted to winning the war, there was a little left over for culture. Orchestras kept right on playing, and members of the eight major ones were exempted from the last desperate total mobilization. The Germans made important advances in using the magnetophone for broadcasting.

Curiously, they developed a four-string piano in place of the usual three-string instrument; he played on it, found it rich in tone but less flexible.

The Bach Aria Group, with William H. Scheide, William Lincer and Sergius Kagen as directors has been organized to perform and record little known choral works by J. S. Bach. The repertoire is being prepared at a Brandon (Vt.) camp, and will be recorded in the Fall.

Barber Is Recognized

Samuel Barber won the annual testimonial of the Music Critics Circle of New York for his Concerto for Violincello and Orchestra, Op. 22, called the American composition considered exceptional in its field and publicly performed for the first time in this city. The Boston Symphony, [redacted]vitzky conducting [redacted] Garbousova soloist, played it here in April.

President Miles Kastendieck said the circle also lauded David Diamond's "Rounds for Strings Orchestra" as deserving a place in symphony repertoires, and gave a special citation to Charles Ives' Third Symphony.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUL 7 - 1946

Last week's survey of music shops revealed there still was a big demand for recordings of "The Gypsy," but few stores had any to sell. Number one album of the week was "Two Sisters from Boston," a Victor set featuring Lauritz Melchior.

TANGLEWOOD, site of the popular Summer concerts in the Berkshires, was the setting for a new Victor Red Seal album which should delight many record collectors. Victor's recording engineers set up shop in the hills of Western Massachusetts to wax Bach's Brandenburg Concertos No. 3 and 4 by [redacted] Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We enjoyed this recording tremendously. It not only is a pleasing performance of two enjoyable works of J. S. Bach, but from a technical viewpoint, this is the closest to a perfect recording we've heard. Acoustics at the Tanglewood theater are acredited by engineers for the result. There are eight 12-inch sides in the set.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 7 - 1946

Three Musical Series Featured in W. Mass.

Tanglewood, Jacob's Pillow Programs Opened—Quadrangle Pops Open This Afternoon — Students, Guests Hear Concert of Exceptional Interest

By VICTOR PRAHL

With the opening of Tanglewood last Sunday, the first programs at Jacob's Pillow given during the week, and our own Quadrangle Pops starting this afternoon, the summer music season is with us once again, and apparently getting off to an exceptionally fine start.

Standing in the well-kept sunlit gardens of Tanglewood last Sunday afternoon, after listening to Dr Koussevitzky's inspiring talk at [redacted] of the school, one sensed anew how fortunate these 400 students are, in having the opportunity of intensive, concentrated study under such favorable auspices and in such a perfect setting.

For the students and an audience of invited guests, the opening week included a concert of exceptional interest, the first in a series of four chamber concerts given by the Berkshire Wood Wind ensemble, with the generous cooperation of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge foundation in the Library of Congress. Under the direction of the gifted oboist, Louis Speyer, the group included George Madsen, flute; Viktor Polatschek, clarinet; Raymond Allard, bassoon; Willem Valkenier, french horn; Jean Le Franc, viola, and Bernard Zighera, piano. Other than the opening quintet by Beethoven, the program provided a delightful contrast in contemporary musical idioms as practiced by Randall Thompson, Paul Hindemith, Francis Poulenc, Harold Shapero, and Vittorio Rieti.

Beethoven's Quintet in E flat for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, was given an authentic and convincing reading with some particularly admirable piano playing on the part of Bernard Zighera in the rhythmical intricacies of the rapid, delicate passages in the last movement. It is amusing to recall that when Beethoven himself once played this work with a similar group at a concert at Munich, he suddenly began to improvise at one of the holds, keeping the four players waiting in expectance, and doubt when to come in. After lifting their instruments in readiness several times, they put them down again until he had finished and signaled them all to resume. He was less tolerant, however, when anyone else presumed to take such liberties, severely reprimanding his pupil, Karl Czerny, for making a few minor changes such as merely doubling in octaves, in a performance of the same work.

Appealing in the directness and simplicity of its melodic content and refreshing in its rhythmical naivete, was Randall Thompson's suite for oboe, clarinet, and viola, in five short movements utilizing a folksy modal idiom suggestive in turn of bagpipes, quaint old dances, and the pastoral spirit. In complete contrast was the more sophisticated chamber music for five wind instruments, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, by Paul Hindemith. Here the more teutonic elements were to the fore—thick, dark harmonies, with difficult, extravagantly arppegiated themes tossed back and forth between the respective instruments. But withal there was an abundance of variety in the contrasting movements. In spite of his pronounced personal style the composer unconsciously ventured into the realm of Claude Debussy for a short moment in the latter part of the slow movement.

Francis Poulenc with his predilection for wind instruments was represented by his trio for piano, oboe, and bassoon in which all three players, Mr Zighera, Mr Speyer, and particularly the bassonist, Mr Allard, were given the opportunity of indulging in some pages of fancy virtuosity. In this piece Poulenc uses his well-tried formula of starting with a few dissonant chords and phrases; just by way of showing that he knows what it is all about, then galloping off as usual with bits of popular songs in hurdy gurdy fashion, juggling his banal themes here and there cannonically or joining them all in a bald, stark unison.

It was a pleasure to hear Harold Shapero, a young teacher in the school, play his third piano sonata, a solid and musically compact work. But I must admit that the piano did not lend itself well as an expressive instrument for the exposition and working out of its musical material, at least in the first three movements. The short, stubby interwoven themes could have been clarified and projected more successfully with one of the rare instrumental combinations at hand. This is not true of the very effective final "Energico," which had a free flow of rhythmical and technical continuity and seemed to be conceived in terms of the instrument for which it was written.

This excellent concert of seldom-heard music closed with a delightful bit of musical buffoonery, a sonata for piano, flute, oboe and bassoon, by Vittorio Rieti. He, who like Poulenc enjoys indulging his musical humor, here achieves in miniature, a subtle Italian opera buffa almost a la Alec Templeton, his three movements paralleling a burlesqued overture, aria, and finale.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

JUL 7 - 1946

SATURDAY: Serge [redacted] and members of the [redacted]phony Orchestra presenting [redacted] of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., will be broadcast (KGKO, 7:30 p.m.).

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

JUL 7 1946

7:30 To 8:30 p.m.: Berkshire Music Festival, Serge [redacted]vitzky, conductor; Boston Symphony [redacted] members; Lukas Foss, pianist; Richard Burgin, violinist; Georges Laurent, flutist. ABC through KGKO. The program:

Brandenburg Concerto, No. 5 in D Minor .... Bach Messrs Foss, Burgin, Laurent.
Serenade in B Flat for Wind Instruments .... Mozart

---

Times Jul 7

MU

THE ARTIST AND THE STATE

By OLIN DOWNES

AT the time when the forces of greed, hypocrisy and barbarism were gathering to engulf the world in its second global war Archibald MacLeish wrote his scathing indictment of his fellow artists for their passivity in the situation, an essay which he entitled "The irresponsibles." His thesis was that future historians, studying the literature of the pre-war period, would be amazed to discover how little the writings of the artists showed of the state of the world at the time, and how conspicuous by absence was any sense of their own responsibility in the situation.

MacLeish found the artistic literature of the period a mass of evasions—the work, largely, of escapists avoiding the great and dangerous issues confronting mankind.

This question was stressed with an exceptional significance in the speech that Dr. Koussevitzky made to his audience at the opening last Monday of his Berkshire Music Center. His words were not those of a pedagogue at the opening of a school. They were those of a leader and artist distinctly responsible and perceptive of the obligations of himself and his colleagues to the world of today.

"The Victory of the Allies . . . as yet . . . has brought only physical liberation to tortured humanity. . . . It will not be soon that men will breathe freely again and that the elements unleashed by war will recede to normal limits. . . . After such upheavals life does not allow to a return to old patterns, to outlived conceptions and forms. It insistently searches for and demands new patterns. These new outlines of the world, even its geographical outlines, are the concern of politics. They are the cause, at the present moment, of much controversy and ill feeling. We are concerned, however, with another question—not politics, but culture.

Culture a Necessity

"If we conceive culture as part of the spiritual life of a people, and the political state as part of its organic life, then their disassociation becomes a great evil and is now intolerable. Just as a body is dead without the spirit, so is a political state dead—a lifeless organism—without the progressive force of enlightenment and culture. The course of history reveals that art and culture were instrumental in attaining perfect, or near perfect, forms of government, such as in ancient Greece or Rome; great minds governed the state combining both political and cultural leadership.

"Let us take a more recent example: less than two centuries ago a young nation was born on the strength of the great American Constitution—a document created by the noblest, the most cultivated and universal minds of our age. These great men—scientists, thinkers and writers—represented the spiritual flowering of their epoch and their people.

"Let us further recognize the fact that, with the advent of the Christian era, practically the entire western culture—music, art, philosophy, literature — radiated from the early churches and monasteries. * * *

"In the events of recent years the search for the causes of the war and the resulting social, political and economic catastrophe disclosed that the foremost problem is the re-education of a whole nation, the revision of ideologies, the reassessment of culture, and the return to culture where it had undergone ugly perversion or proved to be utterly absent."

A Direct Reply

He could have been directly answering the pronouncements of MacLeish and of all forward-looking citizens when he said: "In the progress of life, the question of the creative vocation of man is also the question of a new consciousness. An artist must be conscious of the importance of his spiritual growth and sense his responsibility, beyond the acquired technical perfection, experience and sound knowledge. For only in a completely selfless devotio art of his election will he higher plane of artistic c ness and the true miracl creative art * * *

"If you deprive men of just as they were deprived dignity, human rights, co faith and freedom—you ness the decline of the wo state of brutality and ba Music alone can still t beast in man—it is our com hope. Even religion a churches, having lost thei have also lost their moral and their power over the co of men."

Subsidizing the Arts

Dr. Koussevitzky spok obvious need of a Governm reau of fine arts. "Our hungry for spiritual foo what has been done by t ernment to satisfy this hu there a law preventing de governments from suppor fine arts? None of the de governments are concern this vital question—the su the arts—especially the art. Is it not time for t ernment, leading among cies, to give a permanen to the fine arts?

"We, artists, are the li of art; the state is the gr which art finds stability
ity. It is imperative for to realize and acknow signal need of our time.
the support of the state, mands a department of t arts."

The speech was one for cians and those in all walks to ponder. "We do not de role played by politics in tural development of a c
But we understand, acce support in every way only th icy which has for its aim th of all humanity. We welc policy contributing to the of vital forces of the coun all the vital forces—and em a wide scope of basic huma
ity. But we uncompromisi ject those narrow and bli grams, calculated to furth personal interests, which e life, work in opposition to therefore, are fatal to cultu

"Today we musicians are with a rich heritage. Our is ripe, and we offer it to tressed humanity."

BATON ROU
ADVOCA

JUL 7 19

SATURDA
Berkshire Music
Three soloists will the first Bach-Moz
Saturday, July 13, wh ing broadcast of t
Music festival is hea at 7:30 and 8:30 p.

They are Lukas
Richard Burgin, v
Georges Laurent, flut participate in Bach's
Concerto, No. 5 in D Serge Koussevitzky, r his vacation, will cond of the Boston Sympho in this and other broa festival, which are the first time by t mers Manufacturing waukee.

Dr. Koussevitzky h of the orchestra wit of those for which zart originally wrot

For the second n
13, Dr. Koussevitzk
Mozart's "B-Flat Wind Instruments."

DAVENPOR DEMOCR

JUL

THE FIRST
. . . two Bach-M grams to be presented wood, Mass., at the Music center will be the American network
Saturday night when vitzky directs the M phony in B Flat No. 33 from the String Qu
Minor, Bach's Third Brandenburg concerto art's Woodwind sere Flat. All of the Satu concerts at the Berksh will be heard during

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES

JUL 7 - 1946

Berkshire Music Festival Again Slated for ABC

LENOX, Mass. — For the eleventh year, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will present the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, near this town, and for the third consecutive season, the American Broadcasting company will bring them to a nation-wide audience.

Preliminary to the festival programs, two Bach-Mozart concerts, on July 13 and 20, will be broadcast. Dr. Koussevitzky, interrupting his vacation, will conduct an ensemble of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Bach-Mozart series, the orchestra being kept at the size for which the works were originally written.

The Boston Symphony orchestra leader is probably the world's only conductor of a major orchestra to continue his association with concerts by his musicians during the usual summer vacation. It was during the third Berkshire Festival, in 1936, that the orchestra and its world-famous conductor became associated with this annual gala musical event which is the Mecca for music lovers on this side of the Atlantic.

Originally planned as an "American Salzburg," the festival has grown and now, in the opinion of many, has replaced the older summer event, which was a casualty of the late war.

Many American composers and conductors, now accepted as part of the American musical scene, were given their first encouragement and made their first appearance during this festival. To the school held in connection with the festival have come young composers and conductors, and all have been given a hearing by Dr. Koussevitzky. It was here also that Dorothy Maynor, then an unknown church singer, was brought out by the Boston conductor, who this season is sponsoring Carol Brice, young American artist.

A feature of the season this year will be the first American performance of Benjamin Britton's opera "Peter Grimes," excerpts from which were played during the winter season. Several other important events are planned during the festival, including a series of chamber music programs.

The Bach-Mozart series will be presented from the theatre-concert hall, while the festival concerts will be broadcast by ABC from the Music Shed. The three programs of this series to be heard by ABC listeners will be presented on July 27, Aug. 3 and Aug. 10.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

JUL 7 - 1946

Festival Story

"The Tale of Tanglewood" (Vanguard), by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, is the story of the famous Berkshire Music Festivals with an introduction by Serge Koussevitsky.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD AMERICAN

JUL 7 1946

FIVE WEEKS of festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of Serge Koussevitzky in "Tanglewood," Lenox, Mass., will begin with a Bach-Mozart concert next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct an orchestra of eighteenth century proportions in the intimate Theatre-Concert Hall of the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood. He will present two Brandenburg Concertos of Bach, the third in G major for strings, and the fifth in D major with Lukas Foss, piano; Richard Burgin, violin, and Georges Laurent, flute, as soloists. Mozart will be represented by the Symphony in B flat No. 33 (K. 319), the Adagio from the Quintet in G minor for Strings, and the Serenade in B flat for thirteen wind instruments (K. 361).

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 8 - 1946

Tanglewood Festival Begins Saturday; Koussevitzky Programs Bach-Mozart

Five weeks of Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will begin with a Bach-Mozart concert next Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct an orchestra of 18th century proportions in the intimate Theater-Concert Hall of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. He will present two Brandenburg Concertos of Bach—the third in G major for strings, and the fifth in D major with Lukas Foss, piano; Richard Burgin, violin and Georges Laurent, flute, as soloists. Mozart will be represented by the Symphony in B flat No. 33 (K. 319), the Adagio from the Quintet in G minor for Strings, and the Serenade in B flat for 13 wind instruments (K. 361).

A second Bach-Mozart programme on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon July 20 and 21, will consist of Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto and Fourth Suite, Mozart's Fifth Violin Concerto with William Kroll as soloist, and the "Jupiter" Symphony,

The nine concerts of the Festival in the Music Shed will follow, July 25-Aug. 11.

The new Ninth Symphony of Shostakovich, which is to open the Festival, will be repeated on Saturday, Aug. 10.

TULSA, OKLA.
TRIBUNE

JUL 8 1946

RECORD REVIEWS: A stirring reminder of the values this country fights and lives for is available in a new Victor Red Seal release, an album of records titled "A Testament of Freedom." The words are taken from the writings of Thomas Jefferson, and were set to music by Randall Thompson, of the University of Virginia fine arts department, and presented at that university several years ago in commemoration of the 200th birthday anniversary of Jefferson. The present recording is done by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the skilled direction of Serge Koussevitzky, with the Harvard Glee club singing the words which should be familiar to every American. The text is printed on the front page of the album, making it easy to follow. The music brings to the words the majesty, dignity and solemenity they deserve.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 7 - 1946

The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., will be broadcast again this year by the American Broadcasting Company, at 9:30 p. m. Saturdays over WJZ. Preliminary to the festival programs, two Bach-Mozart concerts, this Saturday and next, will be broadcast. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, interrupting his vacation, will conduct an ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Bach-Mozart series, the orchestra being kept at the size for which the works were originally written.

PADUCAH, KY.
SUN-DEMOCRAT

JUL 8 - 1946

Berkshire Music Festival To Open In Prewar Style

LENOX, Mass., July 8—(U.P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its annual Berkshire music festival July 25 in gala prewar style at Tanglewood, in the hills of western Massachusetts.

A series of nine concerts extending over three week-ends will be given in a bucolic setting. Thousands of music lovers from every corner of the nation are expected to attend. Some will have seats in the music shed. The others sprawl helter-skelter on the lawns of the rambling 200-acre estate—are out of luck if it rains.

The program begins and ends with Beethoven symphonies. However, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has included the works of modern composers, among whom are Rachmaninoff, Copland, Shostakovich and Martinu.

Before the opening of the festival, the orchestra under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky will give a series of four chamber music concerts comprised solely of the music of Bach and Mozart. Longtime favorites, including Bach's Brandenburg Concerto and Mozart's Jupiter Symphony, are on the program.

The festivals have been held annually since their inauguration in 1934. Each time they draw a bigger crowd. The Tanglewood estate, where once Nathaniel Hawthorne lived and wrote "Tanglewood Tales," was presented to the symphony orchestra in 1936 by Mrs. Andres Hepburn and her aunt, Miss Mary A. Tappan. The shed was built in 1938. A crowd of [illegible],000 persons gathered for the series of concerts in 1941.

Nearly a month before the opening of the festival the Berkshire music center opens for six weeks beginning July 1. Unique in purpose, the school gives young musicians a chance to polish their performance before entering the professional fields.

The faculty of the school is composed of the nation's big names in music, including Composer Leonard Bernstein, Gregor Piatigorsky, Aaron Copland and Opera Expert Boris Goldovsky.

The school was closed during the war, but now has accepted more than 300 students in various departments such as composition, instrumentation, conducting, and opera. The opera department plans a performance of Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," a piece that was composed for Tanglewood and produced in England last summer.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUL 7 - 1946

Berkshire Festival Broadcast

Three soloists will be heard on the first Bach-Mozart program, Saturday, when the initial broadcast of the Berkshire Music Festival is heard at 9.30 p. m. over WORC-ABC.

They are Lukas Foss, pianist, Richard Burgin, violinist, and Georges Laurent, flutist, who will participate in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, No. 5 in D minor.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, returning from his vacation, will conduct members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this and other programs of the festival.

The ensemble will not comprise the entire membership of the Boston Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky has set the size of the orchestra within the limits of those for which Bach and Mozart wrote the numbers which will be heard.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL

JUL 8 - 1946

Music Festival To Begin June 13 In Massachusetts

Five weeks of Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Lenox Mass. will begin with a Bach-Mozart concert next Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct an orchestra of Eighteenth century proportions in the Theatre-Concert Hall of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

He will present two Brandenburg Concertos of Bach,—the third in G major for strings, and the fifth in D major with Lukas Foss, piano, Richard Burgin, violin, and Georges Laurent, flute, as soloists. Mozart will be represented by the Symphony in B flat No. 33 the Adagio from the Quintet in G minor for Strings, and the Serenade in B flat for thirteen wind instruments.

A second Bach-Mozart programme on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon July 20th and 21st, will consist of Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto and 4th Suite,—Mozart's Fifth Violin Concerto with William Kroll as soloist, and the "Jupiter" Symphony.

The nine concerts of the Festival in the Music Shed will follow,—July 25—August 11th.

The new Ninth Symphony of Shostakovich, which is to open the Festival, will be repeated on Saturday, August 10th.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 8 - 1946

Should Democracy Subsidize Music?

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

WHEN the Music Center at Tanglewood opened a week or so ago it was a great occasion for Dr. Koussevitzky. This unique educational project was a roseate dream from which he was abruptly awakened by the oncome of the war. It had to be given up; there was no help for it. But now with the war over, the great conductor and inspirer addressed trustees, colleagues, [illegible], and his words [illegible].

He had much to say in tribute to America's prowess in war, her duty in peace, her opportunity for spiritual leadership and of democracy's obligation toward cultural endeavor.

Democracy must underwrite the arts, particularly music, he declared:

"Is there a law preventing democratic governments to support the fine arts? None of the democratic governments are concerned with this vital question — the subsidy of the arts—especially musical art. Is it not time for this government, leading among democracies, to give a permanent support to the fine arts? . . . Art needs the support of the state, and demands a department of the fine arts. The state needs art for the purpose of fortifying and completing its present structure. In ignoring the arts the state will inevitably lose the sustaining interest and influence of the foremost minds and the creative spiritual forces of the nation."

* * *

IT IS NO PLEASURE to disagree with Dr. Koussevitzky. He is a man of vision who sees in a straight line and brooks no impediments in his progress toward a cherished goal. That's how he created Tanglewood with its magnificent installations and the Music Center too.

When he asks for a department of fine arts it is possible to go along with him. There is much that the government could do—and has done—in the encouragement of music and the sister arts. But he specifically asks for subsidy and that is another matter—one of unforeseeable ramifications. Wisdom does not always reside in unanswerable words.

Dr. Koussevitzky is an American citizen and a resident of many years' standing but his perspective on this question is the Old World view. It comes to the fore time after time, usually by affable visiting foreigners. Europe and its opera houses—and its subsidies! It is only in Europe that people are musical. Common folk go to the opera the way Americans go to the movies. Orchestras are state supported and children whistle the Ninth Symphony in the streets.

According to the historical and biographical record all of the truly great musicians had to get along on their own or starve to death—which some of them came near doing. Where was subsidy for Schubert? For the Bayreuth project? For Koussevitzky's own orchestra with which he toured the Volga country?

* * *

SUBSIDY has oftenest been used to support mediocrity, a humanitarian objective since mediocrity must live too but it does not make a people more musical and it does not make great art.

It is strange to hear the doctrine of subsidy from a quarter which until very recently was the very epitome of rugged individualism and the competitive principle in music.

A sort of subsidy already obtains in America though with private rather than public funds. Nearly every composer of reputation in this country is supported in a professional capacity by our colleges and universities. Some appear not to have even classroom duties. Roy Harris is Composer-in-Residence at Colorado College. Ernest Bloch as a faculty member of the University of California is required only to spend a month out of each year there.

It would be impossible to find fault with such an arrangement but is it only a circumstance that if contemporary composition has a common denominator it is a certain technical, academic, intramural quality that smells of the ivy and laurel?

It is a circumstance, too, that much great art has been produced in the garret. But even though that human spirit is so perverse that it often fails to reveal its magnificence except under stress, that is no argument in favor of pain, poverty or war, much less garrets.

* * *

THE CHIEF argument against subsidy is that therein lies the road to politics in music. Musical art is doing all right under this democracy.

When a thunder-storm washed out a tent concert at Tanglewood an $80,000 music pavilion was provided for Dr. Koussevitzky at a snap of the fingers. In fact, the entire Tanglewood plant is a testimonial to imagination and private generosity That is not the way of bureaucracy, red tape and subsidy.

[174]

CORNING, N. Y.
LEADER

JUL 8 - 1946

Book Review

By W. G. Rogers

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD: SCENE OF THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVALS, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky.

Tanglewood from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield - Stockbridge - Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, only 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER

JUL 8 1946

THEY TELL ME:

BY WILMER G. MASON.

Radio will bring to the musical world the American premiere of the new Dmitri Shostakovich Ninth Symphony, to be broadcast August 10 on the fifth and final broadcast from the Berkshire Music Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra according to word just received from the American Broadcasting Company. The program will be carried in Cincinnati by WSAI. When presented November 3, 1945 over the Moscow radio in a broadcast from Leningrad, the work attracted world-wide attention and was made a news story in the Soviet press. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, immediately moved to obtain the score. Ever since the Soviet composer presented his Symphony No. 7, it was reported that he planned a trilogy to commemorate the war and finally victory. The tragic color of the No. 7 and the No. 8 was to be contrasted with the "Victory" idea of the No. 9. Shostakovich admitted the original idea, but is said now to regard the No. 9 as a "bridge" toward another work. The Ninth is in five movements, all exuberant but the fourth section, which is a largo. It has been described by Robert Magidof of the New York Times Magazine staff as "simple, unsophisticated and gay." Magidof was one of four who heard the composer play it on the piano a few hours after he had completed it. The score takes 25 minutes to play.

MALONE, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

JUL 8 - 1946

Book Review

By W. G. ROGERS

The Tale of Tanglewood: Scene of the Berkshire Music Festivals, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard; $2).

Tanglewood from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Kerkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield-Stockbridge-Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above, all Melville.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS-POST

JUL 8 1946

Music Festival Starts Saturday

Five weeks of festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will begin with a Bach-Mozart concert next Saturday evening, July 13, and Sunday afternoon.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct an orchestra of Eighteenth Century proportions in the intimate theater-concert hall of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. He will present two Brandenburg Concertos of Bach, with Lukas Foss, piano; Richard Burgin, violin, and Georges Laurent, flute, as soloists.

Mozart will be represented by the Symphony in B flat No. 33, the Adagio from the Quintet in G minor for Strings, and the Serenade in B flat for 13 wind instruments.

A second Bach-Mozart program on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, July 20 and 21, will be followed by the nine concerts of the festival in the Music Shed July 25-August 11, and the new Ninth Symphony of Shostakovitch, which is to open the festival, will be repeated on Saturday, August 10.

MURFREESBORO, TENN.
NEWS JOURNAL

JUL 8 - 1946

Literary GUIDEPOST

B, W. G. R

The Tale Of Tanglewood: Scene Of The Berkshire Music Festivals, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard; $2).

Tanglewood from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield-Stockbridge-Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, only 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

Eauoru
Gen

Jul 8

Old Instruments To Be Heard at Tanglewood

Music written between 1583 and 1767 will be played at Tanglewood tomorrow evening in the second of four chamber music concerts to be sponsored by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress. Under the direction of Alfred Zighera, the members of the Society of Ancient Instruments will play in the following program. The concert, beginning at 8.15, will be open to guests and members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

The program:

Georg Philipp Telemann..Suite in C major
(Four viols and harpsichord)
J. S. Bach .... Sonata in D major (Harpsichord and viola da gamba)
Orlando Gibbons .... Fantasie
(Four viols)
Domenico Scarlatti .... Sonata in E major Jean Philippe Rameau,
Rigaudons and Tambourin
(Harpsichord solo)
G. F. Handel ... . Sonata in C major
(Viola da gamba and harpsichord)
Francois Couperin .... La Sultane
(Four viols and harpsichord)

MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES

JUL 9 1946

Those musicians who have listened to programs over FM are tremendously impressed by it's ability to reproduce each instrument clearly. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra expressed it as follows when he first heard his orchestra via FM:

"Astonishing—never before in a broadcast have I been able to pick out each instrument individually. Every instrument stands out so clear—so beautiful, so natural. Each instrument keeps just the right color and timbre, particularly the clarinet, which has always been so bad on the air. It is now clear, and has the whole beauty of the instrument.

KINGSPORT, TENN.
TIMES

JUL 8 - 1946

Book Guidepost

By W. G. Rogers

"The Tale of Tanglewood: Scene of the Berkshire Music Festivals," by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard; $2).

Tanglewood from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield - Stockbridge - Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, only 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JUL 9 - 1946

Concerts scheduled for the Berkshire Music Center this week include the Coolidge Chamber Music concert tonight to be given by the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments with Alfred Zighers directing.

The program includes the George Philipp Telemann "Suite in C major" for four viols and harpsichord; the J. S. Bach "Sonata in D major" for harpsichord and viola de garba; the "Fantasia" or Orlando Gibbons for four viols; the Domenica Scarlatti "Sonata in E major" and the "Rigaudons and Tambourin" of Jean Philippe Rameau for harpsichord solo; the 'Sonata in C major" of G. F. Handel for viola de gamba and harpsichor; and "La Sultane" by Francois Souperin for four viols and harpsichord.

On Thursday evening members of the Berkshire Music Center will present chamber music and madrigals; on Friday evening there will be a Berkshire Music Center Orchestra concert by members of department II; and on Saturday afternoon there will be the Berkshire Music Center Choral concert. These are all by invitation only.

On Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon there will be performances of the first Bach-Mozart concert given by an orchestra of 18th century proportions led by Serge Koussevitzky. The program will include two Brandenburg concertos of Bach—the third in G major for strings, and the fifth in D major with Lukas Foss, pianist, Richard Burgin, violinist and Georges Laurent, flutist, as soloists. Mozart will be represented by the symphony in B flat number 33 (K. 319), the Adagio from the Quintet in G minor for strings, and the Serenade in B flat for 13 wind instruments (K. 361).

On Sunday morning there will be a concert by members of the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music group.

STAUNTON, VA.
LEADER

JUL 8 - 1946

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD: SCENE OF THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVALS, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard; $2).

Tanglewood from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tales of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield-Stockbridge-Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Rusia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, only 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

MASON CITY, IOWA
GLOBE-GAZETTE

JUL 9 1946

About Books

By W. G. Rogers

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD: SCENE OF THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVALS, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard; $2).

TANGLEWOOD from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admiringly filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

SPOKANE, WASH.
CHRONICLE

JUL 9 1946

Book Reviews

Tanglewood from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of "The Tale of Tanglewood: Scene of the Berkshire Music Festivals," written by M. A. DeWolfe Howe and published by Vanguard.

It is written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934.

—The Berkshire Coun

Ancient Ins
Played Wel

Boston Society
Director, Pleas
Mrs. Coolidge

By JAY C. ROSENFEL

TANGLEWOOD—The Bo
Society of Ancient Instru
Alfred Zighera, director, g program last night at the shire Music Center at the of four Tuesday evenings p ed with the co-operation
Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge
dation in the Library of Co Last night's program was diametric pole from the o night's program of contem music which was given b
Berkshire Wood Wind Ens
The music was selected fro wonderful generation whic duced Bach, Handel, Tele
Scarlatti, Rameau and Co
There was one representat the previous century, the teenth, Orlando Gibbons.

Students Attend

The members of the socie
Paul Fedorovsky, descant vi
bert Bernard, treble viol, Dufresne, violone, Mr. Zighe ola da gamba, and Putnam A harpsichord. The cordial a included a great share of t dents of the Music Cent whom it was as educating as enjoyable. The four viols a harpsichord played a Tel suite in C major and the Co
"La Sultane." Mr. Zighera
Aldrich played sonatas of B D major, and of Handel, in jor, and Mr. Aldrich did a D ico Scarlatti sonata in E maj
a Rameau Rigaudon and bourin. The Gibbons choic a Fantasie for the four viol

The timbre of the instru which have been supplanted present violins and the pia charming in its suavity and effects. The artists of the e produced a tone of warm refinement. It would be d to ascertain if the instr were ever so well played i heyday as they were last n

But it is not hard to se musicians of that day we satisfied with the possibili the instruments available that time, and continued periment until they arrived particular stage of progress joy today and which has bee or less constant now for so centuries. The peculiar sha sizes of the viols, their sound the wide ribs and other which now appear strange t do the number of strings a on each fingerboard, all of have been discarded, were acteristics which definitely ed and limited the music could be performed on the

But the compositions ar than interesting as milesto musical history, for many o retain their vital interest e day by reason of their intri well as of their apparent

7-11-4

The Concert by Students at Tanglewo

Advanced Gro
To Play in Music Shed

The advanced stu
tra of the Berkshire will give a concert ning at 8.15 in the Shed direction of students
Koussevitzky's condu
115 students in Depa the school will play a symphonic music ope of the Society of Fr
Berkshire Music Cente

Members of the so tickets, who have them, are asked to ca
the box office before

The program follow

Symphony No. 8 in F Ma
(Seymour Lipkin, co Serenade for Strings (194 (Conducted by the co
Prelude to "The Afterno Faun" ....
(Eleazar Carvalho, co Symphony No. 5 (third a movements) (Gerard Samuel, co

—The Berkshire County Eagle, Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Ancient Instruments Played Well at Tanglewood

Boston Society Under Alfred Zighera, Director, Pleases Audience—Mrs. Coolidge Given Ovation

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD—The Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, Alfred Zighera, director, gave a program last night at the Berkshire Music Center at the second of four Tuesday evenings presented with the co-operation of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress. Last night's program was at the diametric pole from the opening night's program of contemporary music which was given by the Berkshire Wood Wind Ensemble. The music was selected from that wonderful generation which produced Bach, Handel, Telemann, Scarlatti, Rameau and Couperin. There was one representative of the previous century, the seventeenth, Orlando Gibbons.

Students Attend

The members of the society are Paul Fedorovsky, descant viol, Albert Bernard, treble viol, Gaston Dufresne, violone, Mr. Zighera, viola da gamba, and Putnam Aldrich, harpsichord. The cordial audience included a great share of the students of the Music Center for whom it was as educating as it was enjoyable. The four viols and the harpsichord played a Telemann suite in C major and the Couperin "La Sultane." Mr. Zighera and Mr. Aldrich played sonatas of Bach, in D major, and of Handel, in C major, and Mr. Aldrich did a Domenico Scarlatti sonata in E major and a Rameau Rigaudon and Tambourin. The Gibbons choice was a Fantasie for the four viols.

The timbre of the instruments which have been supplanted by our present violins and the piano was charming in its suavity and limited effects. The artists of the evening produced a tone of warmth and refinement. It would be difficult to ascertain if the instruments were ever so well played in their heyday as they were last night.

But it is not hard to see why musicians of that day were not satisfied with the possibilities of the instruments available up to that time, and continued to experiment until they arrived at the particular stage of progress we enjoy today and which has been more or less constant now for some two centuries. The peculiar shape and sizes of the viols, their sound holes, the wide ribs and other details which now appear strange to us, as do the number of strings employed on each fingerboard, all of which have been discarded, were characteristics which definitely affected and limited the music which could be performed on them.

But the compositions are more than interesting as milestones in musical history, for many of them retain their vital interest even today by reason of their intrinsic as well as of their apparent virtues.

Last night the members of the ensemble gave vivid and beautifully-prepared performances of the excellent list they had chosen. The intervals between strings and the state of 18th century technique on both keyboards and fingerboards no doubt determined the calibre of performances in those days. Artists of last night's grade, accustomed and capable, as they are, to producing fuller sonorities, made the most of their opportunities.

Ensemble Tone Different

The quality of the ensemble tone on such instruments is quite different from what we expect today. They have not the power nor the blending possibilities of the present violin family, but the performances were strikingly memorable. Mr. Zighera's Bach was deeply impressive and Mr. Aldrich's solos were marked by self-effacing sincerity and the soundest musicianship.

Most of the music played last night as originally intended has been made available for use by the contemporary counterparts of the instruments used last night, and no doubt in their new setting are more sonorous, but such an evening, particularly when done by such exemplary artists, is not only of the highest pleasure but also of the greatest educational value. Both these virtues were as much appreciated by the general audience as by the Music Center students and the handshake of homage which Mr. Zighera proferred Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, who again was in the audience, was indeed a gesture in which the whole audience vicariously lent their warm pressure in gratitude and recognition.

The third event of this series will be held next Tuesday when the Kroll quartet will play. This coming Saturday evening the first of the two Bach-Mozart programs will be given, at which Serge Koussevitzky will appear as director of an orchestra of some 30 of the first chair men of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The same program will be repeated Sunday afternoon and the second program will be played on the corresponding days of the following week end.

The B

Pit

Concert by Students at Tanglewood

Advanced Group To Play in Music Shed

The advanced students' orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center will give a concert tomorrow evening at 8.15 in the Shed. Under the direction of students of Serge Koussevitzky's conducting class, 115 students in Department 2 of the school will play a program of symphonic music open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Members of the society wishing tickets, who have not received them, are asked to call for them at the box office before the concert.

The program follows:

Symphony No. 8 in F Major .. Beethoven
(Seymour Lipkin, conductor)
Serenade for Strings (1945) .... Shapero (Conducted by the composer)
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" .... Debussy
(Eleazar Carvalho, conductor)
Symphony No. 5 (third and fourth movements) .... Shostakovitch (Gerard Samuel, conductor)

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

JUL 10 1946

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD: SCENE OF THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVALS, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard; $2).

Tangle[illegible] from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield - Stockbridge - Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, only 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

NEW CASTLE, IND.
COURIER
7/11/46

WALTER S. CHAMBERS, EDITOR

Art and the State

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, speaking to his audience at the opening of the Berkshire Music Center last week, mentioned the responsibility of the artist for the moulding of our way of living, and reminded his listeners that arts and artists have always had a profound influence upon affairs:

"If we conceive culture as part of the spiritual life of a people, and the political state as part of its organic life, then their disassociation becomes a great evil and is now intolerable. Just as a body is dead without the spirit, so is a political state dead—a lifeless organism—without the progressive force of enlightenment and culture. The course of history reveals that art and culture were instrumental in attaining perfect, or near perfect, forms of government, such as in ancient Greece or Rome; great minds governed the state combining both political and cultural leadership.

"Let us take a more recent example: less than two centuries ago a young nation was born on the strength of the great American Constitution—a document created by the noblest, the most cultivated and universal minds of our age. These great men—scientists, thinkers and writers—represented the spiritual flowering of their epoch and their people.

"Let us further recognize the fact that, with the advent of the Christian era, practically the entire western culture—music, art, philosophy, literature—radiated from the early churches and monasteries. * * *

"In the events of recent years the search for the causes of the war and the resulting social, political and economic catastrophe disclosed that the foremost problem is the re-education of a whole nation, the revision of ideologies, the reassessment of culture, and the return to culture where it had undergone ugly perversion or proved to be utterly absent."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

JUL 11 1946

Charlotte Anthony, folk singer, will perform at the Continental Auditorium, 984 Broad St., Newark, N.J. tonight, Thursday, under the auspices of the Newark Current Events Forum.

Dudley Digges in O'Neil Play

Dudley Digges and Carl Benton Reid have been signed to play important roles in Eugene O'Neill's The Iceman Cometh which will be the first play to be produced by The Theatre Guild next season.

Broadcast Shostakovich Symphony

With the first radio performance of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 in the United States scheduled for Aug. 10, the American Broadcasting Company and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have collaborated in presenting for American listeners in one season the two latest scores by the ranking Soviet contemporary composers.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conducting the Boston ensemble over WJZ on Nov. 17 last, gave the American radio premiere of Serge Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5. Like the Shostakovich No. 9, this work was completed at the special retreat set up for Russian composers by the Russian government during the war.

The Shostakovich No. 9 broadcast will be heard during the final concert of the Berkshire Festival. WJZ will present it at the weekly time of these concerts this season, 9:30 to 10:30 p.m., EDT.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUL 11

6,018 Tanglewood Music Shed Seats Already All Sold Out

Although the opening of the first week-end series of three Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood [illegible] weeks away, every one of the 6,018 seats in the huge music shed has been sold, it was announced today.

This means that there have been 18,054 seats for the three concerts disposed of since the ticket sale began, but in many instances, subscribers have made their reservations for the entire series. The fact that all seats have been sold does not mean that no more admissions are available. As in pre-war days, admissions to the grounds will be sold at the box office before each concert, and in past seasons many attendants have enjoyed hearing the music from outside the shed, the sides of which are open.

The first concert of the three will be on Thursday evening, July 25, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in the first American performance of Shostakovitch's Ninth symphony. The program will also include the Largo (first) movement from Shostakovitch's Sixth and the Beethoven "Eroica, or Third, symphony, in E flat major." The second of the three will be given on Saturday evening, the 27th and the third on Sunday afternoon, the 28th.

Seats in the rear part of the shed are still available for the second and third series of concerts which open on Thursday, Aug. 1 and Thursday, Aug. 10, respectively.

Tickets are also obtainable, it was announced today for the first Bach-Mozart concert, on Saturday evening of this week, which will be the first event of the Tanglewood season open to the general public. The Saturday evening program will be repeated at the second Bach-Mozart concert Sunday afternoon.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

JUL 11 1946

Koussevitzky to Conduct At Berkshire Festival

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., July 1 (Special)—Serge Koussevitzky wil conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festiva here Thursday evening, July 2 Saturday evening, July 27, and Sunday afternoon, July 28.

Outstanding among the program selections is Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 9 which will be presente for the first time in America.

Programs for the Berkshire Festival and other concerts of the Berkshire Music Center may be obtaine from the News-Journal Trave Bureau.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

JUL 11 1946

All Seats Sold For Festival

A sellout of seats in the musi shed at Tanglewood for the firs weekend of the Berkshire Festival was reported today, twc weeks before the opening, or July 25, of the concerts by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Occupants of the 6,018 seats will come from all parts of the United States and Canada. Admission tickets to the grounds, from which the music may be heard distinctly, will be available at the boxoffice.

Reservations in the rear shed for the second and third concert weekends, Thursdays, Saturdays, and Sundays, Aug. 1, 3, 4, 8, 10 and 11, still may be obtained.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
JUL 1 2 1946

By LILY MAY CALDWELL
Radio, Drama, Music Editor

Again this Summer Station WSGN and the American Broadcasting Company network will bring Birmingham listeners the Berkshire Music Festival from Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first broadcast (preliminary to the festival programs) will be two Bach-Mozart one-hour concerts broadcast tonight and at 7:30 p. m. July 20. Dr. Koussevitsky will conduct an ensemble of the Boston Symphony in the Bach-Mozart series, the orchestra being kept at the size for which the works played were originally written.

* * *

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY leader is probably the world's only conductor of a major orchestra to continue his association with concerts by his musicians during the usual Summer vacation. It was during the third Berkshire Festival, in 1936, that the orchestra became associated with this annual gala musical event.

Many American composers and conductors were given their first encouragement and made their first appearances during this festival. To the school, held in connection with the festival, have come young composers and conductors, and all have been given a hearing by Dr. Koussevitzky. It was here also that Dorothy Maynor, then unknown church singer, was brought out by the Boston conductor, who this season is sponsoring Carol Brice, young American artist.

A feature of the season this year will be the first American performance of Benjamin Britton's opera, "Peter Grimes," excerpts from which were played during the Winter season.

The Bach-Mozart series will be presented from the theater-concert hall, while the festival concerts will be broadcast by ABC from the music shed. The three programs of this series will be presented on July 27, Aug. 3 and Aug. 10. In addition to Miss Brice, who will participate in Brahms' "Rhapsody for Alto, Male Chorus and Orchestra," Eugene List, young American pianist, who won world attention when he played for Stalin, Churchill and Truman at the Potsdam Conference, will be heard in Rachmaninoff's "Piano Concerto No. 2."

Bach-Mozart Tomorrow

Eagle Jul

Two Other Concerts At Tanglewood Over Week End

TANGLEWOOD—In addition to the first Bach-Mozart concert, which will be given tomorrow evening at 8.15 and repeated Sunday afternoon at 3.30, two other concerts will be given at the Berkshire Music Center.

Tomorrow afternoon at 2.30 the choral group will give a program, and Sunday morning at 10.30 in the chamber music hall Gregor Piatigorsky's class in chamber music will present a concert. Both events will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

A capacity audience in the small hall heard a program last evening by the madrigal group. The music included Mozart's "Echo Serenade," played by three quartets; Respighi's "Lute Song"; three madrigals by 4 to 10 singers, and a group of Beethoven's settings of Irish, Welch and English folk songs by a quartet with piano trio accompaniment.

The program for the Bach-Mozart concert follows:

Symphony in B-flat, No. 33 (K. 319) Mozart
Adagio from the Quintet in G minor for strings (K. 516) .... Mozart Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for string orchestra (with Sinfonia from the Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden") .. Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major .... Bach
Piano: Lukas Foss Violin: Richard Burgin
Flute: Georges Laurent
Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments (K. 361) .... Mozart

---

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
PRESS
JUL 12 1946

Dr. Koussevitzky Directs For Bach-Mozart Program

Three soloists have been announced for the first Bach-Mozart program marking the opening broadcast of the Berkshire Music festival to be heard Saturday on ABC at 8:30 with the Boston Symphony orchestra participating under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The size of the orchestra has been set within the limits of those for which Bach and Mozart originally wrote. The soloists are: Lukas Foss, pianist; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Georges Laurent, flutist.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
JUL 12 1946

NO SEATS LEFT AT TANGLEWOOD IN FIRST WEEK

Sellout Reported at Festival Shed; Admission Available To Grounds

Lenox, July 12—For the first weekend of the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, all seats are sold. Although it is two weeks until the opening concert on the 25th by the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, all 6018 seats in the mammoth music shed have been reserved by persons from all parts of the United States and Canada. Admission tickets to the grounds, from which the music can be heard distinctly, will be sold at the box office on the days of the concerts.

Reservations may still be made for seats in the rear of the shed for the second and third series of concerts on Thursdays, August 1 and 8; Saturdays, August 3 and 10; and Sundays, August 4 and 11. Tickets may also be obtained for the two Bach-Mozart concerts to be given Saturday evening and repeated Sunday afternoon, and for the second concert the following weekend.

BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITO
JUL 12 1946

Tanglewood Concerts

Five weeks of Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, will begin with a Bach-Mozart concert Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct an orchestra of eighteenth-century proportions in the intimate Theater-Concert Hall of the Berkshire Music Center. He will present two Brandenburg Concertos of Bach—the Third in G major for strings, and the Fifth in D major, with Lukas Foss, piano, Richard Burgin, violin, and Georges Laurent, flute, as soloists. Mozart will be represented by the Symphony in B flat No. 33 (K. 319), the Adagio from the Quintet in G minor for Strings, and the Serenade in B flat for 13 wind instruments (K. 361).

A second Bach-Mozart program on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, July 20 and 21, will consist of Bach's Second Brandenburg Concerto and Fourth Suite, —Mozart's Fifth Violin Concerto with William Kroll as soloist, and the "Jupiter" Symphony.

The nine concerts of the Festival in the Music Shed will follow —July 25-August 11.

The new Ninth Symphony of Shostakovitch, which is to open the Festival, will be repeated on Saturday, August 10.

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
JUL 1 3 1946

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY returns from vacation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of a series of broadcasts of the Berkshire Music Festival, Lenox, Mass., from WTOL at 8:30 tonight. Lukas Foss, pianist; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Georges Laurent, flutist, are soloists.

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JUL 13 1946

The New Recordings

COMPOSITION, PERFORMER, ALBUM NUMBER, NUMBER OF RECORDS	ENGINEERING		REMARKS
	Recording Technique	Surface
BACH, BRANDENBURG CONCERTOS #3 & #4; SINFONIA (CHRIST LAG); PRELUDE in E. Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky. Victor M 1050 (4) $4.75	Recorded in Music Shed at Tanglewood—evidently empty. But brilliance is pleasing. Fine depth of perspective in string recording. Heavy modulation.	A to A—	(See comment below.) 3d Brandenburg is somewhat muscular, 4th rather fast. Orch. is oversized. Yet this is best recording to date of both. Sinfonia (Cantata #4) is dreadfully slow. Prelude in E a good transcription (strings only) of music for solo violin.
WAGNER, LOHENGRIN; ELSA'S DREAM. Traubel, N. Y. Philharmonic, Rodzinski. Columbia 12321D $1	Beautiful balance between voice and orch. Uncanny realism. This is kind of balance Marian Anderson should try. Play a comparable Anderson record and see.	A—	A single, to complement Bridal Chamber Scene album (CX 261). Traubel is best in this relatively superficial Wagner.
BALLADS FROM THE DUSTBOWL Woodie Guthrie. Disc 610 (3 10") $2.75	A much better job than Victor's Guthrie albums. Less distortion, voice more natural.	B—	The Guthrie songs not great folk music, but genuine. Guthrie has beautiful diction. This album preferable to Victor's though surfaces not too good.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
JUL 12 1946

Broadcasts of Berkshire Festival Beginning Over ABC Tomorrow

This Saturday the American Broadcasting Symphony moves its microphones from the Esplanade of the St. Charles River, where it broadcast the Boston Pops Orchestra, to Tanglewood, Maine, the site of the annual Berkshire Festivals. For the first time in the history of this American music festival, both the Bach-Mozart concert series and the festival concerts will be broadcast.

The Berkshire Festival broadcasts start at 9.30 tomorrow night, with a program of orchestral selections under the direction of the regular winter-season Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Dr. Koussevitsky will conduct the fifth [illegible] Brabdenburg Concertos and the Serenade in B flat by Mozart.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
JUL 13 1946

For the eleventh year, Dr. Serg Koussevitzky and members of th Boston Symphony Orchestra, wil present the Berkshire Music Festiv al at Tanglewood, Lennox, Mass and for the third consecutive season, WATR and the America Broadcasting Company will brin them to a nation-wide audience.

Preliminary to the festival programs, two Bach-Mozart concert on July 13 and 20, will be broadcast at 5 P. M. Dr. Koussevitzky, interrupting his vacation, will conduct an ensemble of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra in the Bach Mozart series, the orchestra bein kept at the size for which the work were originally written.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
JUL 1 3 1946

Koussevitzky to Present Berkshire Music Festival

For the 11th year, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, near Boston. WFMJ will broadcast the concert from 9:30 until 10:30 tonight.

Tonight's program will be a Bach-Mozart concert. Three soloists—Lukas Foss, pianist, Richard Burgin, violinist, and George Laurent, flutist—will perform in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, No. 5 in D minor. The second number will be Mozart's B flat Serenade for wind instruments.

Television won't be there, but WKBN's broadcasters will, when a description of the Mahoning Saddle and Bridle Association benefit horse show is aired at 8:30 p. m. Announcers will describe events and probably interview judges and other notables attending the show.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS
JUL 1 3 1946

Dial Suggestions:

Koussevitzky To Conduct Music Festival

Serge Koussevitzky, permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchesta, will conduct members of the orchestra in the opening broadcast of the Berkshire Music Festival. Lukas Foss, pianist; Richard Burgin, violinist; Georges Laurent, flutist, will be soloists for Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D Minor. Mozart's Serenade in B Flat for Wind Instruments will complete the broadcast program (KGKO, 7:30 p.m.) . . . Sylvan Schulman, young American violinist, will conduct the ABC Symphony (KGKO, 3 p.m.) in Schubert's Symphony No. 5 in B Flat, Bartok's Seven Roumanian Dances, Benjamin's Jamaican Rhumba. Emanuel Vardi will be soloist in Theme and Variations for Solo Violo and Orchestra by Alan Schulman, brother of Sylvan.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
JUL 13 1946

Methuen Veteran Now at Tanglewood

A Methuen war veteran, Alan A. Abbott, son of Mr. and Mrs. George E. Abbott of 10 Gage street, is enrolled for the summer's study and concert sessions of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, near Lenox, owned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition to having an opportunity to hear concerts by the members of that orchestra, including five that will be broadcast on successive Saturdays starting tonight at 9:30 o'clock over WLAW and the ABC network, the students will themselves perform during the festival. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is also director of the center and its instrumental faculty is recruited from the Symphony's personnel. Instruction is given in opera, composition, chorus, harmony and chamber music as well as in orchestral playing and conducting.

HARTFORD, C
TIMES
JUL 13 19

Tanglewood Sold For First Weeken

For the first weeke Berkshire Festival at T Lenox, Mass., all seats sold. Although it is until the opening conc 25 by the Boston Sym chestra, conducted by S sevitzky, all 6,018 se mammoth music shed reserved. Admission ti grounds, from which can be heard distinct sold at the box office of the concerts.

Reservations may be seats in the rear of th the second and third se certs on Thursdays, Au Saturdays, Aug. 3 an Sundays, Aug. 4 and may also be obtained Bach-Mozart concerts Saturday evening an Sunday afternoon, and for the second concert the following weekend.

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.

JUL 13 1946

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

OCCASIONALLY I am also reminded of people's notions about performance. Thus, a reader questioned my May 4 reference to Caruso's art as "a vocal, not a musical one": it seemed to him that if one heard a great vocal art one heard a great musical one—that the free flow of beautiful sound was musical.

In my article I had explained "vocal art rather than a musical one" as "an art in singing, not in musical phrasing," and had said that Caruso's emotion "did not express itself in inflection of the musical phrase that employed his voice, but in manipulation of his voice that sometimes produced a beautiful legato phrase and sometimes tore the phrase to pieces." But evidently this distinction had no meaning for my reader, as it has none for most people—the people, for example, who are surprised, bewildered, or even outraged by my criticisms of musicians like Heifetz, Horowitz, and Koussevitzky. I am not referring now to those for whom the performance of any celebrated musician is good, and all the performances by celebrated musicians are equally good in their various ways. I am referring to those who reason that to perform a piece of music is to produce the required sounds, and to produce beautiful sounds is to perform the piece well, and who, dazzled by the tonal splendors produced by Heifetz or Horowitz or Koussevitzky, ask what can be wrong with them, what indeed could be better. They neither perceive nor can understand the distinction between the sensuous quality of a violinist's tone and the phraseological inflection of the tone, and the fact that the dazzling beauty of Heifetz's tone amounts to superb playing of the violin but his fussy, wailing inflection of the tone most often produces a sentimentalizing, cheapening performance of the music.

A letter from another reader made this distinction about Koussevitzky. "The sound was marvelously fine; and the Eroica was a real performance, which carried a certain conviction because it was all so consistent and carefully worked out. There were, of course, the characteristic distortions of the quiet melodies of the first movement; and comparing it with Toscanini's performance revealed exactly what you have always pointed out in Toscanini's playing—the alive flow, the rhythmic continuity, which carries the music forward always with a kind of inevitability, so that the huge intensities come about naturally yet with greatest effect, nothing is distorted or over-emphasized, and the piece adds up to a tremendous intensity and force. The Koussevitzky first movement did not build up at all. Everything was played beautifully but it didn't make a large whole; as a result the climaxes seemed tame and without the exciting meaning Toscanini gives them... But the sound of the orchestra is one of the refinements of civilization."

But a great musician I know surprised me recently by dismissing Koussevitzky as "no conductor, only a dilettante." I was surprised because it turned out that he was thinking of the rhythmic slovenliness, distortion of phrase, and other musical defects that had caused him to leave the concert before the end; and I would have expected him to distinguish Koussevitzky the musician from Koussevitzky the conductor. But then he surprised me further by insisting that he meant the conductor too, contending that the orchestra played marvelously because it was a group of wonderful musicians; and I would have expected him to know better than that. The orchestra that Koussevitzky conducted at his first concert in New York, in November 1924, was the same group of players that Monteux had conducted the preceding April; but its sonority and style were astonishingly changed to what—despite all subsequent changes in personnel—has remained the characteristic sonority and style of the Boston Symphony ever since; and clearly what changed them and then kept them unchanged—except to polish and refine and perfect them—was Koussevitzky. It is the years of work with him that make it possible for the orchestra to play with the same fabulous beauty and finish without him, as it did, for example, when Nadia Boulanger beat time for it at the Harvard Fauré Festival.

The continuity in a Toscanini performance is produced by a continuous activity—a moment-to-moment exercise of concentration, attentiveness, effort, control—which is fascinating and moving to watch in its relation to the moment-to-moment flow of the performance. These two geared continuities are what the OWI film of his performances of Verdi's Overture to "La Forza del Destino" and Hymn of the Nations should have given us by keeping him in uninterrupted view throughout each performance—relating him visually to other participants possibly by changing the angle of the camera to include them, possibly by piecing their images into the background of his, possibly in some other way. Instead the film uses the technique that is conventional in films of orchestral performances—of shifting back and forth between the conductor and members of the orchestra. This technique gives us a number of close-range shots of Toscanini in action—but each time only a few moments of this action broken off for the blowing of the clarinettist or the sawing of the cellists or the singing of a section of the chorus. The moments are impressive and exciting, but not as the uninterrupted sequence would be.

While I am speaking of Toscanini I should mention that throughout the past year I continued to feel the tenseness in his performances that I spoke of in December—a lack of the natural flow described by my reader. I mentioned an example of this in my review of the recorded performance of "The Stars and Stripes Forever" last week: in the earlier performance on the army V-disc there was a relaxed, spacious broadening out for the concluding passage; in the performance on the Victor record there is a tense driving ahead in this passage. It may be the result of emotional strain; and perhaps the performances next fall will show a relaxation of the tension.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

JUL 14 1946

APPALACHAIN SPRING (A Dance Drama by Aaron Copland)
Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitsky conducting.
VICTOR D. M. 1046 6 sides

THIS allegorical ballet has had phenomenal acceptance since its premiere in 1944 with Martha Graham, American ballerina, in the principal role. Winner of both the 1945 Pulitzer Prize and the New York Music Critics award for that year, the work represents the contemporary American composer at the peak of his creative production. Strong, forthright melodic themes and clean dance-like rhythms, forcefully orchestrated, characterize the work. Performance and recording are excellent.

BRANDENBURG CONCERTOS, Nos. 3 and 4 (J. S. Bach).
Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting.
VICTOR D. M. 1050 6 sides.

THESE works are a cross between chamber and orchestral music and are pure polyphonic form. The third scored for strings alone is in two movements only. There is no adagio, but Mr. Koussevitzky has interpolated the Sinfonia from the beautiful cantata "Christ lag in Lodeshanden" written in the relative minor of G Major, as a contrast to the first movement. The last movement in an allegro in the major mood, almost a gigue form, bringing into play every variety of string combination.

Number 4 is scored for 2 flutes and violin against string orchestra. The first movement, allegro, has a near dance-like quality with the flute against violin creating a unique effect. Second movement, adagio, is tender and rather mournful at times but the last movement is a joyous fugue, with the instruments doing a splendid piece of voicing, ending in a presto that holds interest to the last note. —M. M.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

JUL 14 1946

Bach-Mozart Series Opens at Tanglewood

Five weeks of festival concerts by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., get under way this week end, when Dr. Koussevitzky conducts the first of two pairs of Bach-Mozart concerts in the Berkshire Music Center's intimate Theater-Concert Hall.

Programs for the Bach-Mozart series are as follows:

Sat. Eve. and Sun. Aft., July 13-14: Bach—Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 3 and 5; Mozart—Symphony in B-flat, No. 33, Adagio from the Quintet in G minor for Strings, and Serenade in B-flat for Wind Instruments.

Sat. Eve. and Sun. Aft., July 20-21: Bach—Brandenburg Concerto No. 2, and Suite in D major, No. 4; Mozart—Violin Concerto in A major (K. 219) with William Kroll as soloist, and the Jupiter Symphony.

The nine concerts of the Berkshire Festival in the Music Shed will follow, from July 25 to Aug. 11. The new Ninth Symphony of Shostakovich, a feature of the opening program on the 25th, will be repeated on Saturday, Aug. 10.

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS

JUL 14 1946

Bach-Mozart concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will open five weeks of music festival at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., today and tomorrow.

"The Testament of Freedom," consisting of passages from the writings of Jefferson set to music by Randall Thompson, is performed by the Boston symphony, Kousevtizky conducting, and the Harvard Glee club in a new victor album. It's a grand, forthright piece of music. but the enuniciation is none too clear.

For a summertime show the museum of modern art invited seven New York collectors to lend the paintings which have given them "The greatest pleasure and satisfaction."

Result is an exhibit in which Picasso, Cezanne and Renoir Predominate, with Matisse, Rouault and Soutine next. There are two Seurats, two versions of Van Gogh's "L'Arlesienne," and one Daumier. Among works seen publicly for the first time are Ben Shahn's "Father and child," Maurice Sterne's "Provincetown seascape with pier" and Morris Hirshfield's "Daniel in the Lions' Den."

Lenders are Mr. and Mrs. Lee A. Ault, Dr. and Mrs. Harry Bakwin, Miss Katherine S. Dreier, Sidney Janis, Dr. and Mrs. David M. Levy, Mr. and Mrs. Sam A. Lewisohn and James Thrall Soby.

NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT

JUL 14 1946

On the Air

Shostakovich's Symphony Broadcast on August 10

'Victory' Theme of Ninth; Vaughn Monroe Didn't Want to Lead a Band, But—; Another Mystery Show Hits Airwaves This Afternoon

By Warner Twyford

One of the few significant music events of the summer radio season will be the first American performance of Shostakovich's Ninth (and latest) Symphony. It will be broadcast as a feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth and final concert at the Berkshire Music Festival Saturday night, August 10, over ABC and WGH.

The premier performance of the work was broadcast November 3, 1945, over the Moscow radio. It was planned originally as the third in a trilogy, beginning with the Seventh, to commemorate the war and ultimate victory. The tragic color of the Seventh and Eighth would contrast with the "victory" theme of the Ninth. Now, however, Shostakovich is said to regard the Ninth as the bridge toward another work. He tried three times before he finally completed the new symphony, which represents the culmination of nearly three years work.

There are five movements, all exuberant save the fourth, which is largo. Robert Magidof of the New York Times Magazine calls it "simple, unsophisticated and gay." (He heard the composer play it on the piano a few hours after it had been completed).

Soviet critics say it is as close to the classical school as Shostakovich has ever come. Perhaps this is due to the circumstance that during its composition Shostakovich and a fellow composer, Dimitr Kavalevsky, spent their evenings playing Haydn symphonies on the piano, varied with occasional Mozart and Beethoven works.

The work is somewhat briefer than previous Shostakovich symphonies. It takes only 25 minutes to play. It has not been hear outside Russia up to this time, though Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, plans a pre-broadcast performance on the opening night of the festival concerts at Tanglewood July 25.

* * *

He Didn't Want to Lead a Band

Nine years ago Vaughn Monroe was playing first trumpet and singing with Jack Marshard's band at a Boston hotel. He had quite a following among Beacon Hill's debutante set, and he was happy in his job.

But Marshard visualized him as a coming Rudy Vallee. He offered to put a band behind him and arrange a booking for him at a smart Back Bay resort. Monroe refused, at first gently, then firmly. Marshard raved, stormed, finally threatened to fire Monroe if he didn't accept the offer.

And so that's how Vaughn Monroe came to be a band leader. He took the job, but with the understanding that it would be only temporary. At the end of a year, however, he had acquired so many bookings he decided to make it permanent.

In 1940 he reorganized the band with an eye to the masses—up to that time he had restricted his activities to society parties in and around Boston. A year later th revamped orchestra was chosen th most popular young band of th year in the Billboard's annual pol of colleges and universities.

Today Monroe's band feature Betty Norton as vocalist, alon with the crooner himself, of course and the Moon Maids. It's nov heard on WTAR in the Summe replacement spot for Abbott an Costello.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

JUL 1 4 1946

on the Aisle

by Claudia Cassidy

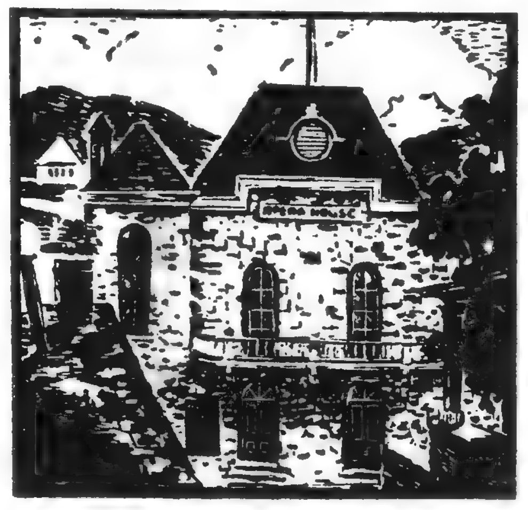
WHEN I found to my sorrow that I couldn't get to Colorado for Central City's festival opening, I wanted something more than a routine report on the occasion, and imagine your and my luck when the William Raglands promised to miss nothing and tell all. Mr. Ragland kept his word with a Central City folder, a program of the opening performance [Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio"], a menu and wine list from the historic Teller House—roast turkey crowned the feast—and a card from the Teller House night club where Russell Swann and the Tune-Toppers held sway. Mrs. Ragland wrote about the opera, and considering that she is Edith Mason, who could hope to do it better? Here is a part of what she had to say.

Glowing Report on Festival Opening at Central City

"We wished all last evening [July 6] that you had been with us at the opening of the Central City opera. It was an unforgettable experience. There were no wide open spaces last night, I can assure you. There seemed to be thousands of people all over. We parked way down the hill for $1. We went up to the Teller House where we found Helen Black [in charge of publicity] and thanks to you we enjoyed your two good seats down near the stage instead of all four of us [Dr. and Mrs. Barborka, also of Chicago, were along] being back in the balcony. We changed places during the opera so we all had a chance to see well. Miss Black was so kind to us, and so sorry you could not get there. She asked me if I would be interviewed over the radio before the performance, which I did.

"There were many notables there. Mrs. John Erskine, Mrs. Heinz [57 varieties], the Governor and Mrs. Vivian of Colorado, a commander of the English navy—I didn't get his name—a Mr. Beebe, a newspaper man of New York [that would be Lucius Beebe of the Herald-Tribune], and I don't know how many others were on the air being interviewed.

"At 8 p. m. the sheriff rode up the main street in a surrey with the fringe on top and, flanked by patrolmen, gave the keys to the opera house to the manager, and the house was unlocked. Many of the audience were dressed in magnificent costumes of the olden times, both men and women. It was so very unusual and picturesque. The Teller House was something to see—all the old carpets, chandeliers, and furniture of the period. As the audience went in the theater there were many Denver university students, girls in charming costumes, who gave every one small bouquets of flowers, which after the performance were thrown on the stage.



Opera House at Central City

"The scenery was excellent, the ballet most original and effective, the orchestra very good, and the ensemble work of the cast showed careful rehearsing which is not done anywhere else today in this country. Emil Cooper [the conductor] did a splendid job and the whole cast and performance were as nearly perfect as anything I have heard since Salzburg. John Carter had a comedy role [Pedrillo] which he did beautifully, and he also sang very well. Eleanor Steber sang her very difficult role [Constanza] beautifully. Felix Knight [Belmonte], whom I had never heard before, also sang very well. Jerome Hines, as Osmin, was wonderful—his impersonation perfect, and he has a grand voice. Marilyn Cotlow has a nice voice and was very clever in her role of Blonda.

"It was a lovely sight to see that shower of bouquets thrown on the stage afterward. We went out along the one street, looking into the windows, at the square dance in the old stable, at the numerous gambling halls, at the bars, etc. We left at 2 a. m. and things were just getting started. But first we went backstage to compliment Frank St. Leger, Cooper, Graf [Herbert Graf, the stage director] and the artists. I can honestly state it was as nearly a perfect cast and performance as one can hope to hear in these days and times anywhere. We are going to hear "Traviata" [the festival's alternate opera] and hope to have reservations at the Heidi chalet."

Knowing Miss Black's resourcefulness, I'm sure they got those reservations, and I hope Mrs. Swarthout was in the mood to dance the mazurka, reputed to be as gala as her cooking. And for those vacationers increasingly in the festival mood, if I am to judge by my jingling telephone, Central City keeps right on going thru July 27.

Compensation for a Stay-at-Home

One of the compensations for staying home was the Grant park concert introducing Frances Yeend and Mario Lanza, uncommonly promising singers, both protégés of Serge Koussevitzky. As long ago as 1942 Mr. Koussevitzky heard Mr. Lanza sing his "lucky" aria, the lament from "Pagliacci," and put him in a Tanglewood student production of "The Merry Wives of Windsor." The war interrupted his work, but Mr. Lanza has been out of the air forces for almost a year and is working under the direction of Herman Adler and Enrico Rosati. Miss Yeend, whose soprano approaches the magnificent, was chosen by Koussevitzky as soloist in the Beethoven Ninth Symphony when he ended the Boston season this year, and she will sing the leading soprano role in "Peter Grimes" next month at Tanglewood.

Helping young talent is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's major aims, and the Berkshire music center, where the Tanglewood festival is held is the realization of some eminently practical dreams. But the dream will not really come to life until that help is nation-wide under government subsidy. Speaking just two weeks ago at the opening of the student season, Mr. Koussevitzky said, "Art needs the support of the state, and demands a department of the fine arts. The state needs art for the purpose of fortifying and completing its present structure. In ignoring the arts the state will inevitably lose the sustaining interest and influence of the foremost minds and the creative spiritual forces of the nation."

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

JUL 14 1946

THE SECOND AND final broad-st of the Bach-Mozart series at e "Berkshire Music Festival" will heard over WSLS Saturday at
0 p. m.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will con-ct an ensemble of Boston's Symony musicians. The program nprises the D Major Suite, No. 4
Bach and the familiar "Jupiter"
phony of Mozart.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN
TIMES
7/14/46

Bach-Mozart concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will open five weeks of music festival at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., today and tomorrow.

"The Testament of Freedom," consisting of passages from the writings of Jefferson set to music by Randall Thompson, is performed by Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky conducting, and the Harvard Glee Club in a new Victor album. It's a grand, forthright piece of music, but the enunciation is none too clear.

NEWS
PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
7/14/46

In The Grooves

Opera in the Movies

Brandenburg Concertos

Within a few weeks, the nation's leading symphonic summer music festival will get under way near Lenox, Mass., when Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in a series of concerts that attracts audiences numbered in the tens of thousands for each event.

These concerts are given in a special shed constructed on the beautiful Tanglewood estate, situated on a lake in the towering Bershire mountains. The countryside is included among the most attractive spots in the United States, not far from Pittsfield, Mass. It is famous for summer resort hotels, large frame buildings equipped with broad verandas and rocking chairs in the typical New England tradition.

The quiet of these inns is disturbed somewhat, however, during the weeks of the Tanglewood festival, for the music lovers descend in droves for many miles around.

Most of the Boston orchestra's recordings have been made in its own Symphony Hall in Boston, but the latest album to be released by RCA Victor (DM-1050) was cut in the Tanglewood shed by the reduced orchestra that held forth there in the war years.

Chosen for the occasion were the third and fourth "Brandenburg" concertos of Johann Sebastian Bach, which are fitted on both sides of four 12-inch disks, with space to spare on an odd side for an arrangement by Pick-Mangiagalli of another Bach movement, called here "Prelude in E."

The series of concertos were dedicated by the composer in 1719 to the Margrave of Brandenburg, whose estate subsequently evaluated the original manuscripts at four groschen, or eight cents.

The third is scored only for stringed instruments — violins, violas and cellos—playing in three groups. Bach designed the work in only two movements, both allegros, Koussevitzky has inserted for contrast the lovely slow melody of the sinfonia from the cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbaden."

A violin and two flues as solo instruments have been added to the strings for the fourth concerto, with Richard Burgin, Georges Laurent and George Madsen emerging from the orchestral ranks to play these solo parts.

In the entire album, the rich, dark color of the Boston strings is captured with admirable realism by the RCA Victor engineers
—R.A.S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 14 1946

TANGLEWOOD GIVES MUSIC BY MOZART

Boston Symphony Orchestra Offers Score at Concert—Bach Work Also Heard

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 13—The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its eighth season of concerts at Tanglewood tonight on a perfect midsummer evening, with a Bach-Mozart program given in the theatre-concert hall which was filled to capacity with an enthusiastic audience of 1,200. Bach-Mozart music has been played here the last two war years and tonight's concert was its continuation.

The Music Shed, with seats for more than 6,000, will be reopened for the main festival of three weekends starting the 25th.

Forty Boston Symphony members participated in tonight's program, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The three Mozart numbers were Symphony in B flat No. 33, adagio from the Quintet in G minor for strings and the Serenade in B flat for wind instruments.

There were two Bach numbers—Brandenburg's Concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra and the Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major for orchestra, with Luka Foss, pianist; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Georges Laurent, flutist.

Dr. Koussevitzky received an ovation at this initial concert of the six weeks' season at the Berkshire Music Center representing a fulfillment of his vision of 1913 in Moscow.

Parking areas have been enlarged since last year and a new ticket and information building is at the main entrance from West Street, Lenox. Already hotels are filled to capacity and no rooms have been available for two months for the music shed concerts. Haydn Mason of Berkshire Hills Conference at Pittsfield, the room clearing house of the festival, has found accommodations for more than 5,000 in private homes, mainly at Pittsfield.

Tonight's program will be repeated tomorrow afternoon and the second and final series of Bach-Mozart will be given Saturday evening, July 20, and Sunday afternoon July 21.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

JUL 14 1946

Summer Festival At Tanglewood

Five weeks of festival concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., began with the Bach-Mozart program last evening, which will be repeated this afternoon.

A second Bach-Mozart program Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon July 20 and 21 will consist of Bach's second Brandenburg concerto and 4th suite, —Mozart's Fifth Violin concerto, with William Kroll as soloist, and the "Jupiter" symphony.

The nine concerts of the festival in the Music Shed will follow—July 25-Aug. 11. The new Ninth Symphony of Shostakovich, which is to open the festival, will be repeated Saturday, Aug. 10.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

JUL 1 4 1946

Right Off the Record

By Stewart Matter

THREE albums of the music by Bach have been released by Victor in the last month, each an interesting contribution. The one of most interest is the "Cantata No. 78—Jesu, der du meine Seele," sung by the Bethlehem Bach Choir, Lucius Metz, tenor; Mack Harrell, baritone and orchestra under the direction of Ifor Jones. This set marks the first recording by this renowned choir and the fact that this is a cantata of Bach which has never before been recorded adds further interest.

This is one of the most attractive works of Bach from a listener's standpoint, reminiscent of the Crucifixus from the B Minor Mass. There is profound spirituality and a sense of humanity which scales heights seldom heard in liturgical music, heights of majestic splendor and quiet dignity far removed from the plane of dross materiality on which we dwell. The performance is outstanding, and while the very bigness may have seemed to outstrip Bach's original concept, there is no denying the impressive effect one obtains. Both soloists are excellent and the orchestra beautifully integrated. The text is sung in English, which hardly seems necessary in a recording when one may play the music over and over with the text before him. Good recording. Set 1045.

The Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky has recorded the "Brandenburg Concertos 3 and 4" in a manner which is strangely Koussevitzky's own. It is true he hews to a smaller Bach orchestra, but the dynamic "lifts" are not what one expects in Bach. He has substituted the "Sinfonia" from the cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden," in place of the slow movement of the third, and while it is supremely beautiful music it is not tradition. I am thrilled at the magnificent performance of Richard Burgin, solo violin, and Georges Laurent and George Madsen, flutes, in the fourth, but on the whole I still turn to the complete recording of the six concertos made by the Busch Players several years ago. One cannot gainsay the supremacy of the Boston strings, but interpretation is another matter. The prelude from the "Violin Sonata No. 6" in the arrangement for orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli completes the set, a veritable tour-de-force. Set 1050.

The third set is a collection of organ music played by E. Power Biggs on the instrument in the Harvard Memorial Church. It seems that Biggs is bent on recording all the organ works of Bach, for already he has given us a thoroughly impressive list. It is well that he has chosen the large organ in this instance instead of the smaller one he used in the past, both because of the wider dynamic range and its tonal qualities. Included are "Little Fugue in G Minor," both the chorale and the prelude based on the chorale, "Ein Feste Burgist unser Gott," the "Fanfare Fugue in C Major," "Sheep May Safely Graze" from "Cantata No. 208," and the "Passacaglia and Fugue in C Minor." If only Biggs would unbend ever so slightly and feel strongly those personal qualities in the music of Bach so necessary to make it convincing, to bring it to full breathing life. He is a master technician, but his technique does not quite serve his ends. It is one of the most impressive collections of Bach organ music ever assembled in one album, and perhaps many folk will not be as literal in their demands as I seem to be. Except for blurring in several climaxes, the recording engineers have done a remarkable job in capturing the true tone of the organ. Set 1048.

You will enjoy the superb singing of Ezio Pinza in two English songs, "Into the Night" of Edwards and "Do You Remember" of Levitzki. His diction is remarkably free of any trace of accent and his conception of the songs faultless. Pinza is a great artist and his accompanist, Gibner King, is a happy match for him. Columbia disc 17378D.

BATON ROUGE, LA.
ADVOCATE

1946

Berkshire Music Festival

The second and final broadcast of the Bach-Mozart series at the Berkshire Music Festival will be heard over WJBO and ABC on Saturday, July 20. The following week and for two weeks thereafter, the festival programs, with the complete Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast.

The feature of the three festival programs will come on Aug. 10 when ABC will present the first broadcast in the United States of Shostakovich's latest work, his "Symphony No. 9."

Dr. Koussevitzky on July 20 again will conduct an ensemble of Boston Symphony musicians. The program comprises the "D-Major Suite, No. 4" of Bach and the familiar "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart. The broadcast will be heard at 7:30 to 8:30 p. m.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

1946

Koussevitzky to Conduct At Berkshire Festival

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., July 10 (Special)—Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival here Thursday evening, July 25, Saturday evening, July 27, and Sunday afternoon, July 28.

Outstanding among the program's selections is Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 9 which will be presented for the first time in America.

Programs for the Berkshire Festival and other concerts of the Berkshire Music Center may be obtained from the News-Journal Travel Bureau.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM

JUL 14 1946

"The Testament of Freedom," consisting of passages from the writings of Jefferson set to music by Randall Thompson, is performed by the Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky conducting, and the Harvard Glee Club in a new Victor album. It's a grand, forthright piece of music, but the enunciation is none too clear.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

JUL 14 1946

on the Aisle
by Claudia Cassidy

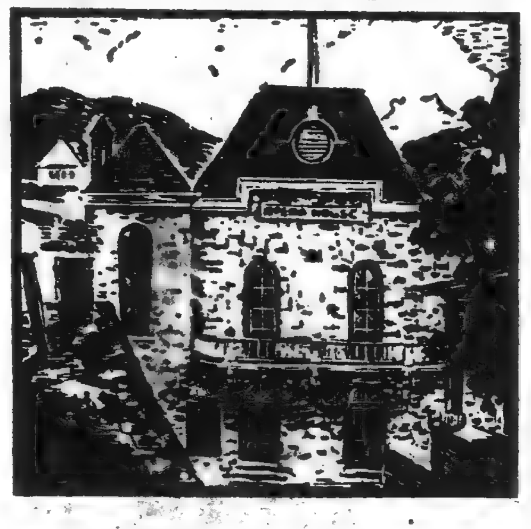
Glowing Report on Festival Opening at Central City

WHEN I found to my sorrow that I couldn't get to Colorado for Central City's festival opening, I wanted something more than a routine report on the occasion, and imagine your and my luck when the William Raglands promised to miss nothing and tell all. Mr. Ragland kept his word with a Central City folder, a program of the opening performance [Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio"], a menu and wine list from the historic Teller House—roast turkey crowned the feast—and a card from the Teller House night club where Russell Swann and the Tune-Toppers held sway. Mrs. Ragland wrote about the opera, and considering that she is Edith Mason, who could hope to do it better? Here is a part of what she had to say.

"We wished all last evening [July 6] that you had been with us at the opening of the Central City opera. It was an unforgettable experience. There were no wide open spaces last night, I can assure you. There seemed to be thousands of people all over. We parked way down the hill for $1. We went up to the Teller House where we found Helen Black [in charge of publicity] and thanks to you we enjoyed your two good seats down near the stage instead of all four of us [Dr. and Mrs. Barborka, also of Chicago, were along] being back in the balcony. We changed places during the opera so we all had a chance to see well. Miss Black was so kind to us, and so sorry you could not get there. She asked me if I would be interviewed over the radio before the performance, which I did.

"There were many notables there. Mrs. John Erskine, Mrs. Heinz [57 varieties], the Governor and Mrs. Vivian of Colorado, a commander of the English navy—I didn't get his name—a Mr. Beebe, a newspaper man of New York [that would be Lucius Beebe of the Herald-Tribune], and I don't know how many others were on the air being interviewed.

"At 8 p. m. the sheriff rode up the main street in a surrey with the fringe on top and, flanked by patrolmen, gave the keys to the opera house to the manager, and the house was unlocked. Many of the audience were dressed in magnificent costumes of the olden times, both men and women. It was so very unusual and picturesque. The Teller House was something to see—all the old carpets, chandeliers, and furniture of the period. As the audience went in the theater there were many Denver university students, girls in charming costumes, who gave every one small bouquets of flowers, which after the performance were thrown on the stage.



Opera House at Central City

"The scenery was excellent, the ballet most original and effective, the orchestra very good, and the ensemble work of the cast showed careful rehearsing which is not done anywhere else today in this country. Emil Cooper [the conductor] did a splendid job and the whole cast and performance were as nearly perfect as anything I have heard since Salzburg. John Carter had a comedy role [Pedrillo] which he did beautifully, and he also sang very well. Eleanor Steber sang her very difficult role [Constanza] beautifully. Felix Knight [Belmonte], whom I had never heard before, also sang very well. Jerome Hines, as Osmin, was wonderful—his impersonation perfect, and he has a grand voice. Marilyn Cotlow has a nice voice and was very clever in her role of Blonda.

"It was a lovely sight to see that shower of bouquets thrown on the stage afterward. We went out along the one street, looking into the windows, at the square dance in the old stable, at the numerous gambling halls, at the bars, etc. We left at 2 a. m. and things were just getting started. But first we went backstage to compliment Frank St. Leger, Cooper, Graf [Herbert Graf, the stage director] and the artists. I can honestly state it was as nearly a perfect cast and performance as one can hope to hear in these days and times anywhere. We are going to hear "Traviata" [the festival's alternate opera] and hope to have reservations at the Heidi chalet."

Knowing Miss Black's resourcefulness, I'm sure they got those reservations, and I hope Mrs. Swarthout was in the mood to dance the mazurka, reputed to be as gala as her cooking. And for those vacationers increasingly in the festival mood, if I am to judge by my jingling telephone, Central City keeps right on going thru July 27.

Compensation for a Stay-at-Home

One of the compensations for staying home was the Grant park concert introducing Frances Yeend and Mario Lanza, uncommonly promising singers, both protégés of Serge Koussevitzky. As long ago as 1942 Mr. Koussevitzky heard Mr. Lanza sing his "lucky" aria, the lament from "Pagliacci," and put him in a Tanglewood student production of "The Merry Wives of Windsor." The war interrupted his work, but Mr. Lanza has been out of the air forces for almost a year and is working under the direction of Herman Adler and Enrico Rosati. Miss Yeend, whose soprano approaches the magnificent, was chosen by Koussevitzky as soloist in the Beethoven Ninth Symphony when he ended the Boston season this year, and she will sing the leading soprano role in "Peter Grimes" next month at Tanglewood.

Helping young talent is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's major aims, and the Berkshire music center, where the Tanglewood festival is held is the realization of some eminently practical dreams. But the dream will not really come to life until that help is nation-wide under government subsidy. Speaking just two weeks ago at the opening of the student season, Mr. Koussevitzky said, "Art needs the support of the state, and demands a department of the fine arts. The state needs art for the purpose of fortifying and completing its present structure. In ignoring the arts the state will inevitably lose the sustaining interest and influence of the foremost minds and the creative spiritual forces of the nation."

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

JUL 14 1946

THE SECOND AND final broad-st of the Bach-Mozart series at e "Berkshire Music Festival" will heard over WSLS Saturday at
0 p. m.
Dr. S[illegible] will cont an ensemble of Boston's Symny musicians. The program prises the D Major Suite, No. 4
Bach and the familiar "Jupiter"
phony of Mozart.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN
TIMES
7/14/46

Bach-Mozart concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will open five weeks of music festival at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., today and tomorrow.

"The Testament of Freedom," consisting of passages from the writings of Jefferson set to music by Randall Thompson, is performed by Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky conducting, and the Harvard Glee Club in a new Victor album. It's a grand, forthright piece of music, but the enunciation is none too cl

---

NEWS
PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
7/14/46

In The Grooves

Opera in the Movies

Brandenburg Concertos

Within a few weeks, the nation's leading symphonic summer music festival will get under way near Lenox, Mass., when Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in a series of concerts that attracts audiences numbered in the tens of thousands for each event.

These concerts are given in a special shed constructed on the beautiful Tanglewood estate, situated on a lake in the towering Bershire mountains. The countryside is included among the most attractive spots in the United States, not far from Pittsfield, Mass. It is famous for summer resort hotels, large frame buildings equipped with broad verandas and rocking chairs in the typical New England tradition.

The quiet of these inns is disturbed somewhat, however, during the weeks of the Tanglewood festival, for the music lovers descend in droves for many miles around.

Most of the Boston orchestra's recordings have been made in its own Symphony Hall in Boston, but the latest album to be released by RCA Victor (DM-1050) was cut in the Tanglewood shed by the reduced orchestra that held forth there in the war years.

Chosen for the occasion were the third and fourth "Brandenburg" concertos of Johann Sebastian Bach, which are fitted on both sides of four 12-inch disks, with space to spare on an odd side for an arrangement by Pick-Mangiagalli of another Bach movement, called here "Prelude in E."

The series of concertos were dedicated by the composer in 1719 to the Margrave of Brandenburg, whose estate subsequently evaluated the original manuscripts at four groschen, or eight cents.

The third is scored only for stringed instruments — violins, violas and cellos—playing in three groups. Bach designed the work in only two movements, both allegros, Koussevitzky has inserted for contrast the lovely slow melody of the sinfonia from the cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbaden."

A violin and two flues as solo instruments have been added to the strings for the fourth concerto, with Richard Burgin, Georges Laurent and George Madsen emerging from the orchestral ranks to play these solo parts.

In the entire album, the rich, dark color of the Boston strings is captured with admirable realism by the RCA Victor engineers
—R.A.S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 14 1946

TANGLEWOOD GIVES MUSIC BY MOZART

Boston Symphony Orchestra Offers Score at Concert—Bach Work Also Heard

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 13—The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its eighth season of concerts at Tanglewood tonight on a perfect midsummer evening, with a Bach-Mozart program given in the theatre-concert hall which was filled to capacity with an enthusiastic audience of 1,200. Bach-Mozart music has been played here the last two war years and tonight's concert was its continuation.

The Music Shed, with seats for more than 6,000, will be reopened for the main festival of three week-ends starting the 25th.

Forty Boston Symphony members participated in tonight's program, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The three Mozart numbers were Symphony in B flat No. 33, adagio from the Quintet in G minor for strings and the Serenade in B flat for wind instruments.

There were two Bach numbers—Brandenburg's Concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra and the Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major for orchestra, with Luka Foss, pianist; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Georges Laurent, flutist.

Dr. Koussevitzky received an ovation at this initial concert of the six weeks' season at the Berkshire Music Center representing a fulfillment of his vision of 1913 in Moscow.

Parking areas have been enlarged since last year and a new ticket and information building is at the main entrance from West Street, Lenox. Already hotels are filled to capacity and no rooms have been available for two months for the music shed concerts. Haydn Mason of Berkshire Hills Conference at Pittsfield, the room clearing house of the festival, has found accommodations for more than 5,000 in private homes, mainly at Pittsfield.

Tonight's program will be repeated tomorrow afternoon and the second and final series of Bach-Mozart will be given Saturday evening, July 20, and Sunday afternoon, July 21.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

JUL 14 1946

Summer Festival At Tanglewood

Five weeks of festival concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., began with the Bach-Mozart program last evening, which will be repeated this afternoon.

A second Bach-Mozart program Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon July 20 and 21 will consist of Bach's second Brandenburg concerto and 4th suite,—Mozart's Fifth Violin concerto, with William Kroll as soloist, and the "Jupiter" symphony.

The nine concerts of the festival in the Music Shed will follow—July 25-Aug. 11. The new Ninth Symphony of Shostakovich, which is to open the festival, will be repeated Saturday, Aug. 10.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

JUL 14 1946

Right Off the Record

By Stewart Matter

THREE albums of the music by Bach have been released by Victor in the last month, each an interesting contribution. The one of most interest is the "Cantata No. 78—Jesu, der du meine Seele," sung by the Bethlehem Bach Choir, Lucius Metz, tenor; Mack Harrell, baritone and orchestra under the direction of Ifor Jones. This set marks the first recording by this renowned choir and the fact that this is a cantata of Bach which has never before been recorded adds further interest.

This is one of the most attractive works of Bach from a listener's standpoint, reminiscent of the Crucifixus from the B Minor Mass. There is profound spirituality and a sense of humanity which scales heights seldom heard in liturgical music, heights of majestic splendor and quiet dignity far removed from the plane of dross materiality on which we dwell. The performance is outstanding, and while the very bigness may have seemed to outstrip Bach's original concept, there is no denying the impressive effect one obtains. Both soloists are excellent and the orchestra beautifully integrated. The text is sung in English, which hardly seems necessary in a recording when one may play the music over and over with the text before him. Good recording. Set 1045.

The Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky has recorded the "Brandenburg Concertos 3 and 4" in a manner which is strangely Koussevitzky's own. It is true he hews to a smaller Bach orchestra, but the dynamic "lifts" are not what one expects in Bach. He has substituted the "Sinfonia" from the cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden," in place of the slow movement of the third, and while it is supremely beautiful music it is not tradition. I am thrilled at the magnificent performance of Richard Burgin, solo violin, and Georges Laurent and George Madsen, flutes, in the fourth, but on the whole I still turn to the complete recording of the six concertos made by the Busch Players several years ago. One cannot gainsay the supremacy of the Boston strings, but interpretation is another matter. The prelude from the "Violin Sonata No. 6" in the arrangement for orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli completes the set, a veritable tour-de-force. Set 1050.

The third set is a collection of organ music played by E. Power Biggs on the instrument in the Harvard Memorial Church. It seems that Biggs is bent on recording all the organ works of Bach, for already he has given us a thoroughly impressive list. It is well that he has chosen the large organ in this instance instead of the smaller one he used in the past, both because of the wider dynamic range and its tonal qualities. Included are "Little Fugue in G Minor," both the chorale and the prelude based on the chorale, "Ein Feste Burgist unser Gott," the "Fanfare Fugue in C Major," "Sheep May Safely Graze" from "Cantata No. 208," and the "Passacaglia and Fugue in C Minor." If only Biggs would unbend ever so slightly and feel strongly those personal qualities in the music of Bach so necessary to make it convincing, to bring it to full breathing life. He is a master technician, but his technioue does not quite serve his ends. It is one of the most impressive collections of Bach organ music ever assembled in one album, and perhaps many folk will not be as literal in their demands as I seem to be. Except for blurring in several climaxes, the recording engineers have done a remarkable job in capturing the true tone of the organ. Set 1048.

You will enjoy the superb singing of Ezio Pinza in two English songs, "Into the Night" of Edwards and "Do You Remember" of Levitzki. His diction is remarkably free of any trace of accent and his conception of the songs faultless. Pinza is a great artist and his accompanist, Gibner King, is a happy match for him. Columbia disc 17378D.

BATON ROUGE, LA.
ADVOCATE

4 1946

Berkshire Music Festival

The second and final broadcast of the Bach-Mozart series at the Berkshire Music Festival will be heard over WJBO and ABC on Saturday, July 20. The following week and for two weeks thereafter, the festival programs, with the complete Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast.

The feature of the three festival programs will come on Aug. 10 when ABC will present the first broadcast in the United States of Shostakovich's latest work, his "Symphony No. 9."

Dr. Koussevitzky on July 20 again will conduct an ensemble of Boston Symphony musicians. The program comprises the "D-Major Suite, No. 4" of Bach and the familiar "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart. The broadcast will be heard at 7:30 to 8:30 p. m.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM

JUL 14 1946

"The Testament of Freedom, consisting of passages from th writings of Jefferson set to mu by Randall Thompson, is performed by the Boston Symphony, Kou sevitzky conducting, and the Harvard Glee Club in a new Victo album. It's a grand, forthright piece of music, but the enunciation is none too clear.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

JUL 10 1946

Koussevitzky to Conduct At Berkshire Festival

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., July 10 (Special)—Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival here Thursday evening, July 25, Saturday evening, July 27, and Sunday afternoon, July 28.

Outstanding among the program's selections is Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 9 which will be presented for the first time in America.

Programs for the Berkshire Festival and other concerts of the Berkshire Music Center may be obtained from the News-Journal Travel Bureau.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

JUL 1 4 1946

on the Aisle

by Claudia Cassidy

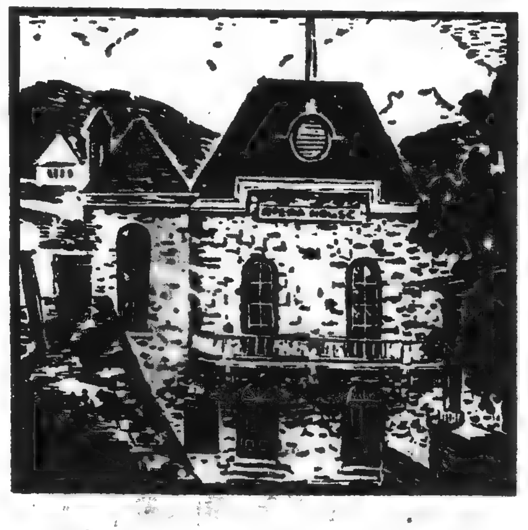
Glowing Report on Festival Opening at Central City

WHEN I found to my sorrow that I couldn't get to Colorado for Central City's festival opening, I wanted something more than a routine report on the occasion, and imagine your and my luck when the William Raglands promised to miss nothing and tell all. Mr. Ragland kept his word with a Central City folder, a program of the opening performance [Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio"], a menu and wine list from the historic Teller House—roast turkey crowned the feast—and a card from the Teller House night club where Russell Swann and the Tune-Toppers held sway. Mrs. Ragland wrote about the opera, and considering that she is Edith Mason, who could hope to do it better? Here is a part of what she had to say.

"We wished all last evening [July 6] that you had been with us at the opening of the Central City opera. It was an unforgettable experience. There were no wide open spaces last night, I can assure you. There seemed to be thousands of people all over. We parked way down the hill for $1. We went up to the Teller House where we found Helen Black [in charge of publicity] and thanks to you we enjoyed your two good seats down near the stage instead of all four of us [Dr. and Mrs. Barborka, also of Chicago, were along] being back in the balcony. We changed places during the opera so we all had a chance to see well. Miss Black was so kind to us, and so sorry you could not get there. She asked me if I would be interviewed over the radio before the performance, which I did.

"There were many notables there. Mrs. John Erskine, Mrs. Heinz [57 varieties], the Governor and Mrs. Vivian of Colorado, a commander of the English navy—I didn't get his name—a Mr. Beebe, a newspaper man of New York [that would be Lucius Beebe of the Herald-Tribune], and I don't know how many others were on the air being interviewed.

"At 8 p. m. the sheriff rode up the main street in a surrey with the fringe on top and, flanked by patrolmen, gave the keys to the opera house to the manager, and the house was unlocked. Many of the audience were dressed in magnificent costumes of the olden times, both men and women. It was so very unusual and picturesque. The Teller House was something to see—all the old carpets, chandeliers, and furniture of the period. As the audience went in the theater there were many Denver university students, girls in charming costumes, who gave every one small bouquets of flowers, which after the performance were thrown on the stage.



Opera House at Central City

"The scenery was excellent, the ballet most original and effective, the orchestra very good, and the ensemble work of the cast showed careful rehearsing which is not done anywhere else today in this country. Emil Cooper [the conductor] did a splendid job and the whole cast and performance were as nearly perfect as anything I have heard since Salzburg. John Carter had a comedy role [Pedrillo] which he did beautifully, and he also sang very well. Eleanor Steber sang her very difficult role [Constanza] beautifully. Felix Knight [Belmonte], whom I had never heard before, also sang very well. Jerome Hines, as Osmin, was wonderful—his impersonation perfect, and he has a grand voice. Marilyn Cotlow has a nice voice and was very clever in her role of Blonda.

"It was a lovely sight to see that shower of bouquets thrown on the stage afterward. We went out along the one street, looking into the windows, at the square dance in the old stable, at the numerous gambling halls, at the bars, etc. We left at 2 a. m. and things were just getting started. But first we went backstage to compliment Frank St. Leger, Cooper, Graf [Herbert Graf, the stage director] and the artists. I can honestly state it was as nearly a perfect cast and performance as one can hope to hear in these days and times anywhere. We are going to hear "Traviata" [the festival's alternate opera] and hope to have reservations at the Heidi chalet."

Knowing Miss Black's resourcefulness, I'm sure they got those reservations, and I hope Mrs. Swarthout was in the mood to dance the mazurka, reputed to be as gala as her cooking. And for those vacationers increasingly in the festival mood, if I am to judge by my jingling telephone, Central City keeps right on going thru July 27.

Compensation for a Stay-at-Home

One of the compensations for staying home was the Grant park concert introducing Frances Yeend and Mario Lanza, uncommonly promising singers, both protégés of Serge Koussevitzky. As long ago as 1942 Mr. Koussevitzky heard Mr. Lanza sing his "lucky" aria, the lament from "Pagliacci," and put him in a Tanglewood student production of "The Merry Wives of Windsor." The war interrupted his work, but Mr. Lanza has been out of the air forces for almost a year and is working under the direction of Herman Adler and Enrico Rosati. Miss Yeend, whose soprano approaches the magnificent, was chosen by Koussevitzky as soloist in the Beethoven Ninth Symphony when he ended the Boston season this year, and she will sing the leading soprano role in "Peter Grimes" next month at Tanglewood.

Helping young talent is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's major aims, and the Berkshire music center, where the Tanglewood festival is held is the realization of some eminently practical dreams. But the dream will not really come to life until that help is nation-wide under government subsidy. Speaking just two weeks ago at the opening of the student season, Mr. Koussevitzky said, "Art needs the support of the state, and demands a department of the fine arts. The state needs art for the purpose of fortifying and completing its present structure. In ignoring the arts the state will inevitably lose the sustaining interest and influence of the foremost minds and the creative spiritual forces of the nation."

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

JUL 14 1946

THE SECOND AND final broadcast of the Bach-Mozart series at the "Berkshire Music Festival" will be heard over WSLS Saturday at 8:30 p. m.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct an ensemble of Boston's Symphony musicians. The program comprises the D Major Suite, No. 4 of Bach and the familiar "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN
TIMES
7/14/46

Bach-Mozart concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will open five weeks of music festival at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., today and tomorrow.

"The Testament of Freedom," consisting of passages from the writings of Jefferson set to music by Randall Thompson, is performed by Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky conducting, and the Harvard Glee Club in a new Victor album. It's a grand, forthright piece of music, but the enunciation is none too clear.

NEWS
PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
7/14/46

In The Grooves

Opera in the Movies

Brandenburg Concertos

Within a few weeks, the nation's leading symphonic summer music festival will get under way near Lenox, Mass., when Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in a series of concerts that attracts audiences numbered in the tens of thousands for each event.

These concerts are given in a special shed constructed on the beautiful Tanglewood estate, situated on a lake in the towering Bershire mountains. The countryside is included among the most attractive spots in the United States, not far from Pittsfield, Mass. It is famous for summer resort hotels, large frame buildings equipped with broad verandas and rocking chairs in the typical New England tradition.

The quiet of these inns is disturbed somewhat, however, during the weeks of the Tanglewood festival, for the music lovers descend in droves for many miles around.

Most of the Boston orchestra's recordings have been made in its own Symphony Hall in Boston, but the latest album to be released by RCA Victor (DM-1050) was cut in the Tanglewood shed by the reduced orchestra that held forth there in the war years.

Chosen for the occasion were the third and fourth "Brandenburg" concertos of Johann Sebastian Bach, which are fitted on both sides of four 12-inch disks, with space to spare on an odd side for an arrangement by Pick-Mangiagalli of another Bach movement, called here "Prelude in E."

The series of concertos were dedicated by the composer in 1719 to the Margrave of Brandenburg, whose estate subsequently evaluated the original manuscripts at four groschen, or eight cents.

The third is scored only for stringed instruments — violins, violas and cellos—playing in three groups. Bach designed the work in only two movements, both allegros, Koussevitzky has inserted for contrast the lovely slow melody of the sinfonia from the cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbaden."

A violin and two flues as solo instruments have been added to the strings for the fourth concerto, with Richard Burgin, Georges Laurent and George Madsen emerging from the orchestral ranks to play these solo parts.

In the entire album, the rich, dark color of the Boston strings is captured with admirable realism by the RCA Victor engineers

—R.A.S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 14 1946

TANGLEWOOD GIVES MUSIC BY MOZART

Boston Symphony Orchestra Offers Score at Concert—Bach Work Also Heard

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 13—The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its eighth season of concerts at Tanglewood tonight on a perfect midsummer evening, with a Bach-Mozart program given in the theatre-concert hall which was filled to capacity with an enthusiastic audience of 1,200. Bach-Mozart music has been played here the last two war years and tonight's concert was its continuation.

The Music Shed, with seats for more than 6,000, will be reopened for the main festival of three weekends starting the 25th.

Forty Boston Symphony members participated in tonight's program, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The three Mozart numbers were Symphony in B flat No. 33, adagio from the Quintet in G minor for strings and the Serenade in B flat for wind instruments.

There were two Bach numbers—Brandenburg's Concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra and the Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major for orchestra, with Luka Foss, pianist; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Georges Laurent, flutist.

Dr. Koussevitzky received an ovation at this initial concert of the six weeks' season at the Berkshire Music Center representing a fulfillment of his vision of 1913 in Moscow.

Parking areas have been enlarged since last year and a new ticket and information building is at the main entrance from West Street, Lenox. Already hotels are filled to capacity and no rooms have been available for two months for the music shed concerts. Haydn Mason of Berkshire Hills Conference at Pittsfield, the room clearing house of the festival, has found accommodations for more than 5,000 in private homes, mainly at Pittsfield.

Tonight's program will be repeated tomorrow afternoon and the second and final series of Bach-Mozart will be given Saturday evening, July 20, and Sunday afternoon, July 21.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

JUL 1 4 1946

Right Off the Record

By Stewart Matter

THREE albums of the music by Bach have been released by Victor in the last month, each an interesting contribution. The one of most interest is the "Cantata No. 78—Jesu, der du meine Seele," sung by the Bethlehem Bach Choir, Lucius Metz, tenor; Mack Harrell, baritone and orchestra under the direction of Ifor Jones. This set marks the first recording by this renowned choir and the fact that this is a cantata of Bach which has never before been recorded adds further interest.

This is one of the most attractive works of Bach from a listener's standpoint, reminiscent of the Crucifixus from the B Minor Mass. There is profound spirituality and a sense of humanity which scales heights seldom heard in liturgical music, heights of majestic splendor and quiet dignity far removed from the plane of dross materiality on which we dwell. The performance is outstanding, and while the very bigness may have seemed to outstrip Bach's original concept, there is no denying the impressive effect one obtains. Both soloists are excellent and the orchestra beautifully integrated. The text is sung in English, which hardly seems necessary in a recording when one may play the music over and over with the text before him. Good recording. Set 1045.

The Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky has recorded the "Brandenburg Concertos 3 and 4" in a manner which is strangely Koussevitzky's own. It is true he hews to a smaller Bach orchestra, but the dynamic "lifts" are not what one expects in Bach. He has substituted the "Sinfonia" from the cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden," in place of the slow movement of the third, and while it is supremely beautiful music it is not tradition. I am thrilled at the magnificent performance of Richard Burgin, solo violin, and Georges Laurent and George Madsen, flutes, in the fourth, but on the whole I still turn to the complete recording of the six concertos made by the Busch Players several years ago. One cannot gainsay the supremacy of the Boston strings, but interpretation is another matter. The prelude from the "Violin Sonata No. 6" in the arrangement for orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli completes the set, a veritable tour-de-force. Set 1050.

The third set is a collection of organ music played by E. Power Biggs on the instrument in the Harvard Memorial Church. It seems that Biggs is bent on recording all the organ works of Bach, for already he has given us a thoroughly impressive list. It is well that he has chosen the large organ in this instance instead of the smaller one he used in the past, both because of the wider dynamic range and its tonal qualities. Included are "Little Fugue in G Minor," both the chorale and the prelude based on the chorale, "Ein Feste Burgist unser Gott," the "Fanfare Fugue in C Major," "Sheep May Safely Graze" from "Cantata No. 208," and the "Passacaglia" and Fugue in C Minor." If only Biggs would unbend ever so slightly and feel strongly those personal qualities in the music of Bach so necessary to make it convincing, to bring it to full breathing life. He is a master technician, but his technioue does not quite serve his ends. It is one of the most impressive collections of Bach organ music ever assembled in one album, and perhaps many folk will not be as literal in their demands as I seem to be. Except for blurring in several climaxes, the recording engineers have done a remarkable job in capturing the true tone of the organ. Set 1048.

You will enjoy the superb singing of Ezio Pinza in two English songs, "Into the Night" of Edwards and "Do You Remember" of Levitzki. His diction is remarkably free of any trace of accent and his conception of the songs faultless. Pinza is a great artist and his accompanist, Gibner King, is a happy match for him. Columbia disc 17378D.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM

JUL 14 1946

"The Testament of Freedom," consisting of passages from the writings of Jefferson set to music by Randall Thompson, is performed by the Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky conducting, and the Harvard Glee Club in a new Victor album. It's a grand, forthright piece of music, but the enunciation is none too clear.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

JUL 14 1946

Summer Festival At Tanglewood

Five weeks of festival concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., began with the Bach-Mozart program last evening, which will be repeated this afternoon.

A second Bach-Mozart program Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon July 20 and 21 will consist of Bach's second Brandenburg concerto and 4th suite,—Mozart's Fifth Violin concerto, with William Kroll as soloist, and the "Jupiter" symphony.

The nine concerts of the festival in the Music Shed will follow—July 25-Aug. 11. The new Ninth Symphony of Shostakovich, which is to open the festival, will be repeated Saturday, Aug. 10.

BATON ROUGE, LA.
ADVOCATE

4 1946

Berkshire Music Festival

The second and final broadcast of the Bach-Mozart series at the Berkshire Music Festival will be heard over WJBO and ABC on Saturday, July 20. The following week and for two weeks thereafter, the festival programs, with the complete Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast.

The feature of the three festival programs will come on Aug. 10 when ABC will present the first broadcast in the United States of Shostakovich's latest work, his "Symphony No. 9."

Dr. Koussevitzky on July 20 again will conduct an ensemble of Boston Symphony musicians. The program comprises the "D-Major Suite, No. 4" of Bach and the familiar "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart. The broadcast will be heard at 7:30 to 8:30 p. m.

WILMINGTON, DEL
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

JUL 1 6 1946

Koussevitzky to Conduct At Berkshire Festival

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., July 10 (Special)—Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival here Thursday evening, July 25, Saturday evening, July 27, and Sunday afternoon, July 28.

Outstanding among the program's selections is Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 9 which will be presented for the first time in America.

Programs for the Berkshire Festival and other concerts of the Berkshire Music Center may be obtained from the News-Journal Travel Bureau.

[179]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

JUL 1 4 1946

Koussevitzky Offers Much German Art

By Glenn Dillard Gunn

TANGLEWOOD and the Berkshire Music Center, scene of the summer concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of the activities of Koussevitzky's school for symphonists, and for the chamber concerts sponsored by Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, began July 2 with one of the concerts in the Coolidge chamber series.

This inaugural is a tribute to Mrs. Coolidge who, with the late Henry Hadley, distinguished American composer and conductor, started the activities which have developed so importantly. As H. A. DeWolfe Howe points out in his delightful history of the Tanglewood concerts and the Berkshire Music Center, the modest chamber programs which Mrs. Coolidge held in her summer home near Lenox, grew into the summer symphony concerts undertaken, with her support, by Mr. Hadley and a group of players from the New York Philharmonic. Hadley then was associate conductor of that famous orchestra.

Hadley's failing health obliged him to retire in favor of Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Koussevitzky immediately proved himself a great organizer and executive. An establishment equipped with every facility for concerts, large and small, and with quarters housing a school that now accommodates 300 students has grown from his efforts.

* * *

ACTIVITIES revolve around the concerts of the Boston Orchestra under Koussevitzky. Starting yesterday and continuing until August 11, with concerts on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday evenings, the programs opened with a Bach-Mozart Festival. With the concert of Thursday, July 25, the programs will be chiefly modern, except for the week of August 1 which will be devoted to the symphonic works of Brahms. A first American performance of the Ninth Symphony by Shostakovich, scheduled for July 25 is the most important item in the European repertoire.

Koussevitzky will repeat the Fifth Symphony of Prokofieff; Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" (second suite); Copland's "Appalachian Spring"; Martinu's Concerto for violin (Mischa Elman, soloist); Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for piano (Eugene List, soloist); Randel Thompson's "Testament of Freedom," for male chorus and orchestra; William Schuman's American Festival Overture. Total score by nationalities: Russia, 5; Germany, 26; Czechoslovakia, 1; France, 1; United States, 3. The German lead, of course, is established in the Bach-Mozart-Brahms concerts.

* * *

IF NO British composers are represented on these Boston Symphony programs, there is compensation in the opera "Peter Grimes," by Benjamin Britten. This was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center. Forces of the school will give it its American premiere on the evening of August 6. Citizens of this country also can take comfort from the inclusion of Thompson's "Testament of Freedom," which is paired with the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven on the last concert.

Few will be found who are rash enough to describe the Thompson work as the better though many may confess, after the event, that they found it more inspiring. The choral elements of the Beethoven Ninth have lost their appeal. "The Testament of Freedom," based on texts by Thomas Jefferson, defines an American approach to the same subject, namely, the brotherhood of man. Jefferson's words and sentiments are theoretically much admired in Virginia. Now it can be learned how New England reacts to them.

* * *

THE function of the Berkshire Music Center is to train composers, conductors, and symphonists. Koussevitzky planned such an institution many years ago for Moscow under the Tsars. He has realized his ambition here. Some fine young conductors and composers have been developed in the few years of the Berkshire Music Center's existence. Richard Bales is one whom Washington knows and admires. Leonard Bernstein, now conductor of the New York City Symphony, is another. He returns as a faculty member of the Berkshire Music Center this summer.

This is not the oldest school for symphonists and conductors in the United States. Frederick Stock founded the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's Civic Orchestra for exactly the same purposes. It flourished for 30 years under his supervision and under the direction of Eric Delamarter. Orchestras all over the country are filled with its alumnae. One of these is Henry Sopkin who has just been made conductor of the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

HE IS a greatly gifted young man, and, like Kindler, a pioneer. Atlanta and Sopkin collaborated, last year, on a Youth Orchestra with such significant results that the Atlanta Journal called him a genius and a wizard with both the orchestra and the audience. The city collaborated again, providing ample funds and Sopkin has been commissioned to establish a first-class orchestra.

Meanwhile his alma mater, the Chicago Civic Orchestra, under Desire Defauw, who succeeded the late Frederick Stock, and Hans Lange, who recently resigned, has declined.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

JUL 1 4 1946

Music Off the Records

By Fredson Bowers

IN 1943, while serving as the chairman of the music department at the University of Virginia, Randall Thompson was commissioned to compose a suitable work for the commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Thomas Jefferson. "The Testament of Freedom," for male chorus and orchestra, resulted, and was given its premiere in a broadcast performance by the University Glee Club in April, 1943. This thrilling piece has now been recorded on three Victor records by the Harvard Glee Club and the Boston Symphony, conducted by Koussevitsky (VM-1054).

"The Testament of Freedom" is composed of certain excerpts from Jefferson's writings sung by the chorus interwoven with an important orchestral setting. The problem of setting prose to music is a difficult one, since it lacks the rhythmic beat of verse which is appropriate for melodic treatment. Dr. Thompson solved the difficulty with considerable ingenuity. The whole work is divided into four parts, which in mood correspond to the four contrasting movements of a symphony, with a recapitulation at the end from the material from the first movement. The first part is given over completely to an extensive treatment of the magnificent sentence from "A Summary View" (1774), which reads, "The God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time, the hand of force may destroy but cannot disjoin them." Working with this short text, Thompson breaks it up melodically into a series of magnificent connected phrases which are capable of complex development both here and in the conclusion. This stirring movement, with its recapitulation, is a memorable one; it truly sings; in fact and in one's memory, and the thematic material of this paean to freedom is subtly repeated and interwoven in the orchestral parts of the succeeding movements.

The second section sets a long passage from the Declaration of Causes, beginning, "We have counted the costs of this contest . . ." and corresponds to the slow movement. The choral part utilizes the method of the chant to achieve the proper solemnity. The third section, from the same source, which begins, "We fight not for glory or for conquest," once more returns to a melodic treatment. There is a certain shock at first at hearing this passage begin to a cocky marching tune, but the imaginative justification is soon perceived as the movement progresses and the vivid illusion of a streaming horde of people, constantly gaining strength and numbers, marching irresistibly forward, is transmitted. The fourth section returns to the chant for the brief setting of a passage from a letter to John Adams in 1821, beginning, "I shall not die without a hope that light and liberty are on steady advance." This setting is prefaced by a considerable orchestral passage on a transformation of the theme of the first section. Moreover, at the conclusion of the chorus the orchestra begins a transition which, after a series of steps, broadens out into a brilliant climactic reaffirmation of the "liberty" theme of the opening in which the choral work is more complex, coming at last to an impressive finish with the hammer-blow repetition of liberty, liberty, liberty.

The deep sympathy which Randall Thompson brought to this work is matched only by the sureness of his art by which he has created a brilliant and memorable addition to American music. His profound melodic gift joined to his gift for choral writing has formed a work which is truly musical and without question stands head and shoulders above any other music I have heard which has been inspired by the war. Koussevitsky conducts feelingly; the Harvard Glee Club is admirable. The recording matches the performance. The only possible flaw is a roughness in the surfaces of several of the records in my review copy.

* * *

Mr. Bowers will answer letters of inquiry about the choice of records, past and present.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JUL 1 4 1946

Government's Interest in Music Urged

Koussevitzky Echoes Dvorak's Expression For Federal Aid

By Alice Eversman

In his address at the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center June 30, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the director said, "Our world is hungry for spiritual food. But what has been done by the Government to satisfy this hunger? Is there a law preventing democratic governments to support the fine arts? None of the democratic governments are concerned with this vital question—the subsidy of the arts—especially musical arts. Is it not time for this Government, leading among democracies, to give permanent support to the fine arts?"

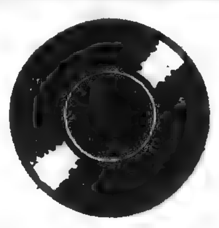
What Dr. Koussevitzky underscores is a question that assumes more and more importance as music becomes firmly entrenched in the community life of the country. Agitation for governmental interest in fine arts is of long standing but without result. However, the director's statement is too sweeping in its assertion that "None of the democratic governments are concerned with this vital question."

Countries Set Example.

If no department of fine arts actually exists, other democratic governments have aided in the encouragement of music. In Paris, for instance, there is the opera, subsidized in part by the government, where Dr. Koussevitzky conducted its orchestra and the Conservatoire de Musique founded in 1795 by the Convention Nationale. Mexico has its government-owned Conservatory of Music besides its Orquesta Sinfonica, partly financed by the federal district of Mexico which subsidizes, at the same time, El Bande de Policia. The Opera House of Mexico City and the renowned ones of Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires are outstanding examples of government aid. In other Latin American republics support has been given to national conservatories, orchestras and other means by which musical culture can be disseminated.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

JUL 1 4 1946



Records In Review

By NORMAN NAIRN

J. S. BACH: Brandenberg Concertos Nos. 3 and 4. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Bach's six Brandenberg concertos are among the finest of his output, and an integral part of the symphonic repertoire. The new recording, following closely on issue of the Godberg Variations, should be a welcome addition to one's library.

Recorded in 1945 in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, scene of the Berkshire Festivals, the RCA engineers have produced a splendid balance. I do not agree with other writers who find Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Bach wanting. To me it is clear, convincing and understanding, and here is the consummate artistry for which the Bostonians are famous.

In the Concerto Number 3, written for strings alone, and containing no slow movement, conductors are accustomed to insert a slow movement from Bach's other works. Dr. Koussevitzky has interpolated the expressive Sinfonia from the cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden," contrasting with the two allegro movements.

The Concerto Number 4, for flutes and solo violin against the orchestral strings, is particularly satisfactory, with Georges Laurent and George Madsen, flutes, and Richard Burgin, concertmaster, playing the concertino parts. Odd side of the album is given over to the Prelude in E, arranged by Pick-Mangiagelli from the Bach Sixth Sonata for violin. (Victor, four 12-inch records).

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUL 14 19

Tanglewood

By E. S. VAN OLINDA

FOR the first week-end of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, at "Tanglewood," near Lenox, Mass., July 25, 27 and 28, all 6,018 seats have been sold or held on reservation. Admission tickets to the grounds, from which the music may be heard distinctly, will be sold at the box office on the days and nights of the concerts.

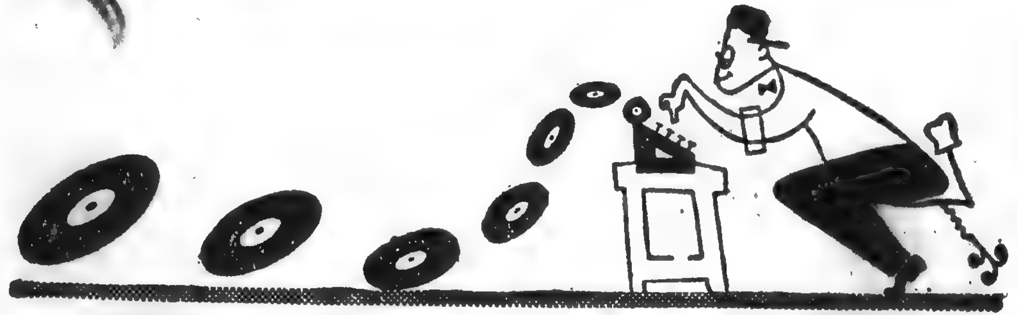
Reservations may still be made for seats in the rear of the shed for the second and third series of concerts on Thursday, August 1 and 8; Saturdays, August 3 and 10 and Sundays, Aug. 4 and 11. There is a limited number of tickets available for the Bach-Mozart concerts this afternoon and for the second series, the following week-ends. Information is available at the Van Curler Music company, this city.

The Berkshire Music center, with an enrollment of 400 students from all over the United States and South and Latin-America, who will study under the distinguished faculty, headed by Dr. Koussevitzky, includes five students from the Albany Area. They are: David Hamilton Bailey, 657 Washington avenue; Leo J. D'Allesandro, 255 Second avenue; Thomas G. Kenny, Jr., 303 Madison avenue; Eleanore M. Lauterbarn, 32 Van Schoick avenue and Leo Mehigian, 25 Kent street, of Albany, Miss Jean Colton Bowen, 8 Carroll place, Slingerlands, and Robert L Craft, of Kingston.

The program for the Bach-Mozart pre-festival this afternoon will include Symphony in B-flat by Mozart; Adagio from quintette in G-minor by Bach; Bradenburg concerti, No. 3 and No. 5 by Bach and Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments by Mozart. This concert will start at 3:30 o'clock in the Theatre-Concert hall.

LEXINGTON, KY.
LEADER

JUL 14 1946



RECORD NOTES

THOMPSON: THE TESTAMENT OF FREEDOM (A Setting of Four Passages from the Writings of Thomas Jefferson), played by Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, and the Harvard Glee club, G. Wallace Southworth, choral conductor. Victor, DM-1054.

Another album of contemporary American music makes its appearance this month with Victor's release of Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom." This work for orchestra and male chorus is a setting of four passages from the writings of Thomas Jefferson. It was composed in honor of the 200th anniversary of Jefferson's birth, and it was first performed at the University of Virginia—which Jefferson founded and where Randall Thompson teaches music—by the University Glee club on April 13, 1943.

This is an interesting musical experiment. Thompson has attempted conscientiously to provide a musical setting for a text which does not lend itself to such treatment. Except for a few inspired moments, it is a pretty dull piece of music. The performance by the Harvard Glee club and Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Koussevitsky is excellent and the recording is unusually good. But as a great musical composition it fails to meet the test.

the benefit of a great symphony orchestra under the baton of a distinguished conductor — Artur Rodzinski. Kurt Baum fails to measure up to the requirements of a great Lohengrin. He has been associated primarily with Italian and French roles at the Metropolitan, and his voice is a bit too lyrical for the demands of Wagner's music. He sings well, but when compared with Traubel, he fails to reach the heights of what might have been a great recording.

The other recording of this scene is the truly great one sung by Kirsten Flagstad and Lauritz Melchior with the orchestra directed by Charles O'Connell. (Victor, M-897). For sheer vocal opulence this recording is superb. It is Flagstad at her finest and although Melchior's voice is a bit dark in quality, he is a worthy co-artist in this great scene.

In selecting this recording the collector should listen carefully to both albums. The final choice will depend upon personal likes and dislikes as far as Wagnerian interpretation is concerned. Either album is worthy of a place in a record library.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

JUL 14 1946

Howe Presents Music History Of Tanglewood

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe (Vanguard $2.00).

From Hawthorne to Koussevitzky, great personages who [illegible] lent themselves to the renown of Tanglewood in the Berkshires live in the pages of this little book, briefly, to be sure, but with a graciousness enhanced by the fine old-school prose and the happily reminiscent treatment given by Mr. Howe. In a matter of 60 pages, the development of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and the Berkshire Music Center is unfolded with quiet enthusiasm and sincere appreciation, together with a good deal of giving credit where credit is due.

The pace is one of unbroken leisureliness, finding time for such neat witticisms as a reference to "these days of the candid camera, of open countenances openly arrived at." There is withal an economy of expression and a rigid and unerring selection of material relevant to this particular presentation, which makes the story remarkably full and complete.

A complete listing of the Festival programs, from 1934 through 1936, occupies the last 25 pages of the book, and gives it exceptional value as a reference work. The brief introduction is by Serge Koussevitzky, who catches the atmosphere of the book in a sentence: "The pen of Mark Howe evokes with indefinable charm memories of Tanglewood born of the genius of Nathaniel Hawthorne, its legendary fascination and historic background, and, further, tells the tale of wonder and beauty of the Tanglewood of our day."

With the perspective of a lifetime extending past fourscore years, Mr. Howe has evoked a valuable portrayal of one of America's foremost cultural centers.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM

JUL 14 1946

AS THE TURNTABLE TURNS

Reviewing the Latest Phonograph Records

AARON COPLAND: "Appalachian Spring," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitsky. Album of three Victor records in Record-Story form (M-DM-1046), $4.26.

The title of the work is misleading, unless one knows the circumstances of its origin. It is not a tone-poem describing the coming of spring in the eastern mountains, but a ballet written expressly for that militant exponent of uninhibited Americanism, Martha Graham.

Miss Graham had used a former composition of Copland for dance treatment, and their artistic affinity led to a desire for further collaboration, which might never have come to fruitage had not Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, the benefactress of chamber music pioneering in new fields, became so enthusiastic over her first witnessing of a Graham program in 1942 that she at once commissioned three new ballets for her, the music to be by Milhaud, Hindemith and Copland. The new Copland ballet was first given in Washington in 1944, on Mrs. Coolidge's 80th birthday.

The music is a faithful reflection of the psychological elements of the situation, austere, ecstatic, hopeful, even mystical, with a healthy admixture of youthful spirits and dreams. The recording brings forward eight scenes from the ballet in music full of vitality, realism and even charm.

Koussevitzky in his early days in Paris was the outspoken champion of new music, and his knowledge of Copland's gifts date from that period. This recording has sturdy resonance, stark strength and imagination.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JUL 14 1946

Modern Tales Of Tanglewood

"The Tale of Tanglewood": Scene of the Berkshire music festivals, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, introduction by Serge Koussevitzky. (Vanguard, $2.)

Tanglewood from Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of this pretty little book, written by a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner in a prose which is limpid and sparkling, as indeed it ought to be since the author, luckier than most, has had 82 years in which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, only 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD

JUL 14 1946

BACH: BRANDENBURG CONCERTOS 3 AND 4—In the summer the U. S. musical capital becomes Tanglewood, Mass., where Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra present their Berkshire festivals. Appropriate at this time is the release of the third and fourth of J. S. Bach's six concertos as recorded by the Bostonians in the smaller concert hall at Tanglewood. These concertos were not for full orchestra—the No. 3 is all-string and the No. 4 for flute and strings. Therefore the compositions serve certain members of the Boston organization rather than the entire ensemble. At any rate, we preferred the No. 4, with its interplay of the flutes and violins. Between the two concertos is a side of Bach's Violin Sonata No. 6: Prelude in E. (Victor)

DENVER, COLO.
ROCKY MT. NEWS

JUL 14 1946

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD: SCENE OF THE BERKSHIRE FESTIVALS by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, with an introduction by Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard, $2).

A beautifully written account of the development of Hawthorne's favorite rustic resort into an international music center.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

JUL 14 1946

Second Bach-Mozart Series To Be Aired On Saturday

The second and final broadcast of the Bach-Mozart series at the Berkshire Musical Festival will be heard over WTJS-ABC on Saturday, July 20. The following week and for two weeks thereafter, the festival programs, with the complete Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast.

The feature of the three festival programs will come on August 10 when ABC will present the first broadcast in the United States of Shostakovich's latest work, his "Symphony No. 9."

Dr. Koussevitzky on July 20 again will conduct an ensemble of Boston Symphony musicians. The program comprises the "D-Major Suite, No. 4" of Bach and the familiar "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart. The broadcast, another in the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company series, will be heard at 7:30 to 8:30 p. m.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 14 1946

AUDIENCE THRONGS TANGLEWOOD HALL FOR KOUSSEVITSKY

Boston Symphony Members Give First of Season's Concerts Open to the General Public

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, July 13—The first of the Bach-Mozart concerts given by leading members of the Boston Symphony under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky took place in the theater- concert hall at Tanglewood tonight. This was the first of the season's concerts open to the general public and as in previous seasons the hall was filled to capacity with the usual overflow extending in the garden, a stimulating festival atmosphere prevailing on all sides.

Dr Koussevitzky, obviously in fine fettle, infused the opening movement og Mozart's "Symphony in B flat" (K.319) generally known as the "Salzburg" with buoyancy of spirit, elegance of phrasing, and a delicate precision, the "Andante moderato" with warmth and intimacy of feeling, and the grateful "Menuetto" with an infectious rhythm. It is interesting to observe that the master added this movement sometime after the work was completed. The buffo elements of the gay "Finale" were projected with a shimmering lightness and an exuberance of rhythm. An ovation for the conductor and his players followed the performance of this little masterpiece. In complete contrast was the tonal richness and dark lyric beauty of one of the same composer's immortal pages, the "Adagio ma non troppo" from the "Quintet in G Minor for Strings" (K. 516).

At this time there was a lengthy intermission, requiring a slight change in the program, in order to get proper timing for the broadcasting of a portion of the evening's music.

concluded with a sturdy and vitally rhythmic performance of Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 3". Consisting of but two short lively movements, Dr Koussevitzky interpolates by way of contrast, the inspired measures of the Sinfonia from the master's 4th cantata "Christ Lay in Deaths Dark Chains" which in tonight's performance was invested with a depth of tonal feeling which was truly moving.

Another "Brandenburg Concerto" No. 5 in D major, opened the second half and although the violin (Richard Burgin) the flute (Georges Laurent) play important roles, it is the piano that dominates as solo instrument. Lukas Foss revealed a subtle sense of ensemble in the contrapuntal phrases with the two other instruments and emerged with a stunning bit of pianistic virtuosity in the climactic pages of the first movement. There was a singing tone of fullness and depth in the "Adagio" and some remarkably neat playing in the "Allegro". The conductor joined the audience in applauding him heartily.

The program concluded with a stury and vitally rhythmic performance of Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 3" Consisting of but two short lively movements, Dr Koussevitzky interpolates by way of contrast, the inspired measure of the Sinfonia from the master's 4th cantata "Christ Lay in Death's Dark Claims" which in to-heartily. The next selection was Mozart's "Serenade in B flat for Wind Instruments" (K. 361) one band being recalled repeatedly.

with Mozart's "Serenade in B flat for Wind Instruments" (K. 361) one of the composer's rarer compositions in which the "Theme and Variations" and shorter pieces in the folk dance idiom of the epoch serve the master's ingenuity in writing for this unusual combination. Chuckles from the audience greeted the strange sounds and naive rhythms, all executed with such skill and virtuosity on the part of the different players. Enthusiasm ran high, Dr Koussevitzky and his band being recalled repeatedly. The same program will be repeated tomorrow afternoon.

The same program will be repeated tomorrow afternoon.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

JUL 14 1946

THE SECOND AND final broadcast of the Bach-Mozart series at the "Berkshire Music Festival" will be heard over WSLS Saturday at 8:30 p. m.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct an ensemble of Boston's Symphony musicians. The program comprises the D Major Suite, No. 4 of Bach and the familiar "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart.

6—The Berkshire Evening Eagle, Monday, July 15, 1946

Program Formally Opens Season at Tanglewood

Koussevitzky Presents Bach-Mozart Concert in First of Two Week-End Events—Concerts in Shed Begin July 25

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The Bach-Mozart program at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon was a repetition of the concert played the previous evening in the same auditorium, the theatre-concert hall, and marked the formal opening of the 1946 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its summer grounds. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's venerated and far-seeing conductor, led a small orchestra of some 30 musicians in the first of two programs planned for successive week ends on the pattern of last year's concerts.

Favored by made-to-order weather the audiences started to gather early, and among the earliest were those who had brought their blankets and rugs and had claim-staked vantage points on the lawn directly behind the building. Never had the Berkshires provided better conditions for music, and rarely has better music been provided. Dr. Koussevitzky had again chosen an orchestra of about the proportions which were obtained in the days of the two composers whose works had been singled out for exclusive use on these particular programs, one which well suited the music and as well suited the wonderful acoustic qualities of the hall.

Every phase of the Tanglewood venture and of the Berkshire Music Center shows the over-all great vision of the orchestra's conductor and the Berkshire Music Center's organizer. Conspicuous in this first program was the major appreciation of the two masters' essential differences. Bach, by Koussevitzky, is expressed with vigor and intensity; Mozart, by grace and charm. Bach is firmly implanted on a broad pedestal; Mozart is lightly mobile. That was the broad and general conception of the whole program, but for each piece, or picture, there was a complete palette within its proper frame.

Mozart Adagio

For sheer tonal beauty the Adagio from the Mozart quintet for strings (G major) reached a pinnacle to which comparison is rather futile. The immortal pages which Mozart provided found a magnificent interpreter in the Boston orchestra's leader. The sensitive response of the 27 string players was refined with a jeweler's painstaking accuracy. The high good judgment of the conductor in never asking his players here for their full power was remarkably effective, especially as he reserved it and only asked for its release in the more appropriate moments in Bach. The beseeching tenderness of short phrase-details, the purity of the statements and answers in different voices of the peerless string choir, was marred by only the slightest details as, possibly, the numerical weakness of the violas when their voices should have been heard more full-throated.

The same composer's Serenade for Wind Instruments (B flat) was on the same plane. Who will forget the very first entrance of the Largo, and the numberless later swift changes of tone from loud to soft, not only their subtle execution but the artistic sense which dictated them. Mozart also supplied one other composition on this program—the B flat symphony, No. 33. It was played with the same spirit and qualifications which were the temper of the whole list, but it is one of the less consequential of the symphonies, and its main interest lies more in the playing than in the printed pages.

Brandenburg Concertos

From Bach there were two Brandenburg concertos, No. 3 and 5. The third, for string orchestra, was a robust vehicle and a wonderful contrast to the preceding Mozart adagio. The transfer of a short "Sinfonia," "Christ lag in Todesbanden," from another volume of Bach to replace the two-chord bridge which, in the score, joins the two main movements, was a happy decision for it brought a moving and poignant fragment to the whole.

In the fifth Brandenburg, the soloists were, as last year, Lukas Foss, piano; Richard Burgin, violin, and Georges Laurent, flute. An altered seating arrangement this year in which the violin solo sat at the front of the stage, the flute stood beside him, and the piano was placed directly behind, gave more due prominence to the first two instruments, and allowed their valuable contributions to be heard to better advantage. The piano, of course, has the spotlight most of the time by reason of the lavish part allotted it. Mr. Foss accomplished it with poetry and artistry, and in the cadenza practically took flight in the sweeping roulades. The audience responded, as it had throughout the program, with a degree of cordiality and approval which has such a peculiarly special quality as almost to warrant being called "Tanglewoodian." Mr. Koussevitzky was recalled time after time, and was markedly generous, as always, in graciously indicating the musicians to whom favor was due, and, when no one was to be singled out, he asked all to rise and share with him the recognition a sophisticated audience was eager to show.

While the "big" Tanglewood events in the Shed are eagerly anticipated starting a fortnight hence, this and the second pair of concerts this coming week end in the theatre-concert hall have won the almost affectionate interest of large numbers of music-lovers, and they might be difficult to convince that any of the many activities on the now-famed lot are as worthy and excel these short Bach-Mozart Festivals.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JUL 15 1946

SEASON BEGINS AT TANGLEWOOD

By IRVING KOLODIN

Lenox, Mass., July 14.—Seventeen minutes from New York as the jet plane flies, three hours or so by more conventional transportation, Tanglewood in the Berkshires is again a million light years from prosaic music-making in 1946 as it was in peacetime. Though the formal Berkshire Symphonic Festival is still two weeks off, Serge Koussevitzky offered some choice pre-festival performances over the week end for those fortunate thousands able to crowd into the intimate Theater-Concert Hall this afternoon and last night, under conditions, physical and artistic, that were perfection.

One could make out a very good case for the idea that Koussevitzky himself relishes the concerts of the past week end and the one to come even more than those of the main festival. On these occasions, he is working with a picked ensemble of thirty players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra—music's creme de la creme. It is a pleasure that any conductor would relish, any mere listener feel privileged to share.

For the first pair of the four-concert series. Koussevitzky devoted himself to some truly princely music. This included the third and fifth concerti of the series Bach wrote for the elector of Brandenburg, a B flat symphony (No. 32) and a serenade for winds which Mozart wrote for his titled employer in Salzburg during the 1780's. It is true that each royal patron had the pleasure of hearing these works for the first time, but hardly in such regal performances as the customers at Tanglewood enjoyed for their admission fee.

This applied especially to the Serenade for Wind Instruments (K.361) played by a dozen virtuosi of the orchestra, including such eminent but unadvertised artists as oboist Gillet, clarinetist Polatschek, hornists Valkenier and MacDonald, and that sage of the bass bassoon, Boaz Pillar. The work itself was worth the trip to Tanglewood to hear—not alone for its superb imagination and watch-movement workmanship, but also because one is not likely to hear it again in a dozen seasons' concert-going in any American metropolis. The performance was a miracle of devotion and taste, beginning with the inspired leadership of Koussevitzky and reflecting equal credit on every one of the participants.

If the conditions for hearing a full symphony orchestra in the large shed, which lies a mashie shot away (across lawns that rival any well-kept fairway), can be described as ideal, one may canvey something of the charm of the spare, well-designed Theater-Concert Hall by saying that it is twice as good for these intimate concerts. The Bach concerti were superbly played (as were the symphony and a movement from Mozart's G minor quintet), but the wind instrument serenade was, indeed, a song to remember. A different program of Bach and Mozart will be played next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, with William Kroll as soloist in the latter's A major violin concerto.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM

JUL 14 1946

Bach-Mozart concerts, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will open five weeks of music festival a Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUL 15 1946

First Bach-Mozart Concert Presented

Capacity Audiences Hear Two Performances

FIRST FOR PUBLIC

Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts Leading Boston Symphony Players in Interesting Program.

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, was opened to the general public for the first times this season on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted leading members of the Boston Symphony orchestra in two performances of the first 1946 Bach-Mozart concert.

Audiences which filled the Tanglewood theater-concert hall and spilled out onto the spacious grounds, under a warm full moon Saturday night, but a blazing July sun yesterday afternoon, enjoyed the program which included Mozart's Symphony in B flat, No. 33, the adagio movement from his Quintet in G minor for strings, and his serenade in B flat for wind instruments, and Bach's No. 3 Brandenburg concerto in G minor for string orchestra, into which Dr. Koussevitzky intepolated the Sinfonia from the cantata "Christ Lay in Death's Dark Chains," and his No. 5 Brandenburg concerto, D minor. In the latter, Lukas Foss brilliantly performed the piano work and the violin and flute parts were played respectively by Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony, and Georges Laurent. The No. 5 Brandenburg concerto and the Mozart B-flat serenade were broadcast over a national network.

Prior to Saturday evening the performances at Tanglewood, since the Music Center opened on June 30, had consisted of performances by members of the Center orchestra, chamber music and choral groups and the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge foundation chamber music concerts, attendance at all of which was limited to members of the Society of Friends of the Music Center. Similar activities are scheduled for Tuesday, Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoon of this week but on Saturday evening the second of the Bach-Mozart concerts will be given and it will be repeated Sunday afternoon.

8—The Berkshire Evening Eagle,

3000 Attend Programs at Tanglewood

William Kroll To Be Heard in Concert Tomorrow Night

With a total audience of more than 3000 for the two presentations of the first Bach-Mozart concert, a chamber music concert and a choral program, the Berkshire Music Center looked and sounded like a prewar week end at Tanglewood.

Fifty students, trained and directed by Robert Shaw, sang Milhaud's "The Two Cities," four Negro Spirituals, Hindemith's "Six Chansons" and Beethoven's Santafia" to an audience of 500 in the theatre-concert hall Saturday afternoon, and yesterday morning a capacity audience in the chamber music hall heard 14 members of Gregor Piatigorsky's chamber music group from Department 2 play Haydn's Quintet in D Minor, Hindemith's Chamber Music for Wind Quintet and Schumann's Piano Quintet in E Flat.

Picnic parties gathered on the lawns for lunch and supper and students attended concerts with a musical score under one arm and a bathing suit wrapped in a towel in the other, for a swim in Stockbridge Bowl after the program.

The next event open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center will be the concert tomorrow evening at 8.15, under the aupices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation. The other members of the string quartet, directed by William Kroll, violinist, are Louis Graeler, violin; Nathan Gordon, viola; Avron Twerdowsky, violincello. Mr. Kroll, who will be a soloist in Mozart's violin concerto in A major in the second Bach-Mozart program this week end, spent several summers in Pittsfield when he played at South Mountain.

The program for tomorrow evening's concert follows:

String Quartet in F minor, Op. 95, Beethoven
String Quartet No. 2, Op. 92 .... Prokofieff
String Quartet in D major, Op. 64, No. 5, Haydn

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 15 1946

SCENE OF AMERICAN PREMIER—The Theater Concert Hall at Tanglewood will be the scene, Aug. 6, 7 and 9, of the first American presentation of Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," which was composed on commission for performance at the Berkshire Music Center.

The opera, which was performed with outstanding success in England and other European countries, will be produced by the Opera Department, under the direction of Dr. Herbert Graf, Richard Rychtarik designing the settings and Leonard Bernstein conducting each performance. The chorus will be prepared by Hugh Ross. There will be two evenings of opera scenes by the opera workshop, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky.

Saturday and Sunday Bach-Mozart programs were given in the Hall under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Next Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon the programs will include the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major with Richard Burgin, violin; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Georges Laurent, flute, and Roger Voison, trumpet. William Kroll will be heard in the Mozart Violin Concerto in A major, No. 5; and the remainder of the program will include Bach's Suite (Overture) in D major, No. 4, and Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, No. 41.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUL 16 1946

Boston Symphony Opens Tanglewood Music Season

The Little World series of music which drew thousands of visitors from nearly every state in the Union to "Tanglewood" near Stockbridge, Mass., last summer opened Saturday night, with a repeat performance Sunday afternoon in the theatre-concert auditorium, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, in an all Bach-Mozart program. As a preview of what is planned for the greater festival season, beginning July 25 and ending August 11 in the big music shed, it spoke volumes for the artistic and esthetic music feast to come.

The week-end program included the symphony in B-flat and the adagio movement from the G-minor by Mozart; the 3rd and 5th Brandenburg concertos by Bach and the Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments by Mozart, meticulously played and interpreted by the cream of the orchestra under the inspired baton of Dr. Koussevitzky. In spite of a heavy schedule recently completed, the Boston maestro never appeared to be in finer fettle nor in better physical condition for the busy season ahead of him at "Tanglewood."

It would be folly for a mere layman to try to review such an aggregation of virtuosi as that assembled for this, the most important musical event in America, with any degree of conviction for those who were not privileged to be present. The Boston Symphony orchestra and its distinguished conductor may always be relied upon to present the ultimate in tonal beauty, nuance and spiritual conception of the composer's emotional inspiration.

Perhaps the two numbers which had the widest audience appeal were the Brandenburg concertos, the (5th), enlisting the exquisite piano, violin and flute playing of Lukas Foss, Richard Burgin and George Laurent, respectively.

Also, interesting to lovers of the classics, was the use of the key men of the woodwind section of the orchestra in the organ-like effect created by these aristocrats of the orchestra in the Mozart Serenade. Another pre-festival Bach-Mozart program will be presented next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

JUL 16 1946

Dorothy Wire of Dallas is listed among the 400 students accepted for admission to this summer's study and concert sessions of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the 200-acre estate outside Lenox, Mass., owned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Besides having the opportunity to hear concerts by members of that orchestra, including a series of five broadcasts which began Saturday (KGKO, 7:30 p.m.), the students themselves will perform during the festival which ends Aug. 11.

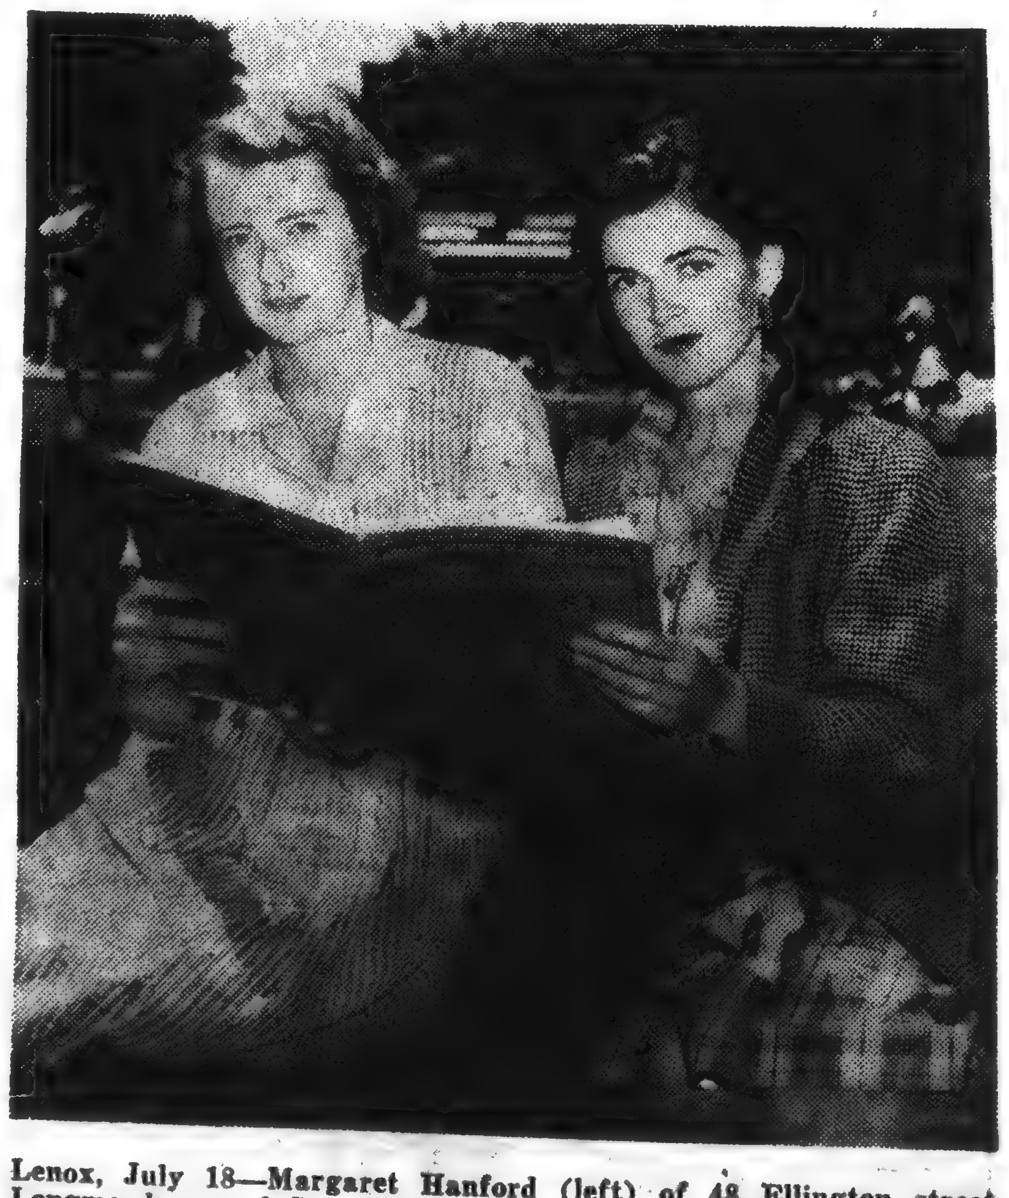
Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, also is director of the center, and its instrumental faculty is recruited from the symphony's personnel. Instruction is given in opera, composition, chorus, harmony, and chamber music, as well as in orchestral conducting and playing.

Students from thirty-three states, the District of Columbia, Canada, and several South American countries are attending.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 18 1946

Studying at Tanglewood



Lenox, July 18—Margaret Hanford (left) of 48 Ellington street, Longmeadow, and Rose-Helen Pizzitola of 98 East Alvord street, Springfield, study a score on the lawn of Tanglewood, where they are students at the Berkshire Music center. Learning ensemble work in the orchestral department, Miss Hanford is a flutist, and Miss Pizzitola a violinist.

BERKSHIRE EVE. EAGLE
JULY 16

Kroll Soloist For Mozart Concerto

Second Tanglewood Series Scheduled For Week End

The Brandenburg concerto No. 2 in F major and the suite in D major, No. 4 by Bach, with Mozart's violin concerto in A major, No. 5, and "Jupiter" Symphony will be the program for the second and last Bach-Mozart concert by principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. It will be given in the theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood Saturday evening and repeated Sunday afternoon.

William Kroll will be the soloist for the Mozart concerto and for the Brandenburg concerto the soloists will be Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; and Roger Voisin, trumpet.

The Mozart symphony No. 41 in C major, the last one written by the composer, is described by Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt, musicologist at Harvard, as "generally considered one of the peaks of the entire symphonic literature. The C major symphony," he states, "did not receive its title, 'Jupiter,' from Mozart himself, but from later admirers, on account of its Hellenic clarity even in complexity, its power combined with supreme beauty and its unsurpassed art of structure."

Tickets for the programs are on sale at Tanglewood; England Brothers book department; the Curtis Hotel, Lenox; the Blue Bird Shop, Stockbridge; and the Chamber of Commerce information booth, Great Barrington.

Opera Scenes At Tanglewood Tomorrow Night

Scenes from operas will be presented tomorrow evening at 8.15 at Tanglewood by the opera workshop of the school. The performance in the theatre-concert hall will be open to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Membership in the society is by any voluntary contribution mailed or presented at the box office at Tanglewood.

Kroll Quartet Plays at Music Center July 17

Third in Series of Chamber Music Concerts Presented

By JAY ROSENFELD

The third of the four Tuesday evening chamber music concerts at the Berkshire Music Center, being presented with the co-operation of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress, was played last night by the Kroll Quartet. William Kroll plays first violin, Louis Graeler, second violin; Nathan Gordon, viola and Avron Twerdowsky, cello.

The program consisted of the Beethoven F minor, Opus 95, the Haydn D major, Opus 64, No. 5, and the Prokofieff 2d, Opus 92. Beethoven, himself, styled his eleventh quartet "Serioso," and any ensemble only seeking popular success would hardly choose it, but the Krolls are very evidently influenced by other considerations and motives. Thus to offer the opportunity to hear this great quartet which is somewhere near the borderline of what has categorically been defined as Beethoven's "late" period, was a gesture for which only gratitude was due.

It is thick writing, which made the transparent co-ordination of the performance all the more remarkable. To be able to hear what's happening in all four corners in such a quartet and yet maintain such unified spirit is surely the goal of ensemble playing. The Krolls played with positive brilliance.

The same type of rare playing was continued in the new Prokofieff quartet. While it was a complete contrast to the preceding Beethoven, yet it still had a greater degree of seriousness than is commonly noticeable in the work of this outstanding Russian. Written less than five years ago, he still makes his music flippant, almost to insincerity, certainly witty almost to wise-cracking, but concededly gifted and facile. The Krolls caught the character of this new work with easy accuracy, and kept the playing as obvious as the writing demanded.

To complete the cycle of musical expression the Haydn "Lark" was a perfect choice. From the warbling entrance of the first violin above the staccato opening theme in the other instruments, which gives the quartet its name, through each of the four beautiful movements, the Krolls played with suave elegance and virile refinement and at the end of the final wizardly-played allegro, they received such tumultuous acclaim that the whole evening can safely be recorded as a triumph. The quartet was recalled time after time, and the applause was redoubled when Mr. Kroll stepped to the front of the platform and graciously asked Mrs. Coolidge to rise and share with the quartet the expression of enthusiasm and gratitude which the large audience seemed intent on according them.

BLOOMFIELD, IND.
WORLD

JUL 17 1946

Serge Koussevitzky, speaking to his audiences at the opening of the Berkshire Music Center recently, mentioned the responsibility of the artist for the moulding of our way of living, and reminded his listeners that arts and artists have always had a profound influence upon affairs.

"If we conceive culture as part of the spiritual life of a people, and the political state as part of its organic life, then their disassociation becomes a great evil and is now intolerable," Koussevitzky said. "Just as a body is dead without the spirit, so is a political state dead—a lifeless organism—without the progressive force of enlightenment and culture. The course of history reveals that art and culture were instrumental in attaining perfect, or near perfect, forms of government, such as in ancient Greece or Rome. . . ."

AMESBURY, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 17 1946

Miss Roslyn Levine At Berkshire Music Center

Selected To Sing In Opera August 6, 7 And 8

Selected as one of 300 from a list of music supervisors and students of music from all parts of the country, Miss Roslyn Levine, supervisor of music in the local public schools, is in attendance at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, where she is studying choral conducting and madrigal singing under Hugh Ross and Robert Shaw.

Miss Levine, whose beautiful soprano voice has delighted many in Amesbury, has been selected to sing in the group which will present the first performance in America of Boitten's opera "Peter Grimes." Leonard Bernstien, assistant to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is the director of the Berkshire Music Center, himself an outstanding exponent of the opera, is directing the presentation.

This opera will be presented on August 6, 7 and 9 before an anticipated audience of 2000 in the huge music shed at Tanglewood.

Miss Levine has also been selected as one of a group of 12 sopranos to take part in the first performance in this country of the cantata "Maissance de la Beaute" by Lourie. This will be presented on Tuesday evening, July 23, in conjunction with the Berkshire Chamber Orchestra. Valentia Vishnevska will sing the leading soprano role.

In addition to singing under Hugh Ross and Robert Shaw, the local music supervisor, is studying with Boris Goldovsky instruction in operatic technique and Stanley Chapple in instrumental conducting.

The Berkshire Music Center, which resumed this year after being suspended for three years because of the war, is continuing along on its original plan. Located at Tanglewood, one of the outstanding estates in the famous Berkshire Hills, the Center annually atracts thousands of music lovers from all sections of the East. The Boston Symphony Orchestra continues to be the principal attration but the programs offered by the 300 students, some of whom are vocalists, others instrumentalists, continue to grow in prestige.

Miss Levine, in a letter to a local friend, reports that she has never been any more busy in her life. She says that she and the other students are either attending classes at at rehearsal from 8:30 in the morning until 10 most every night. She states that much of which she is learning will be of value to the work which she is doing in the local schools.

One of the outstanding achievements of Miss Levine since she came to Amesbury as supervisor of music, has been the development of choruses at both the Junior and Senior High Schools. Both of these organizations created much favorable comment because of their work this past year.

Tanglewood Hasn't Changed Much, Reporter Discovers

Even the Faces of 'Celebrities' Are The Same and as Familiar as Admirals And Generals of World War II

It's the same old story at Tanglewood where 28,000 music lovers from all over the world flocked for the first series of concerts at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival which will continue for the next two week ends.

The concert program yesterday afternoon attracted 9500 people, which number, to the surprise of many, was 500 fewer than attended Saturday night's event.

The week-end weather was ideal. Hundreds of spectators, including many tourists who have been attracted to the Berkshires for the greatest outdoor musical show in the East, took advantage of the pleasant sun-baked terraces to picnic and inspect the grounds which command a picturesque view of beautiful Lake Mahkeenac before the concerts.

A casual stroll through the Shed revealed nothing new, except perhaps a reflection to the 1934 days when the Festival was born in a horse show ring at the old Dan Hanna estate in near-by Interlaken where the late Dr. Henry Hadley conducted a hand-picked group of musicians in "music under the moon."

Seated with the 516 patrons in the box section of the Shed, built by Joseph Franz of Stockbridge who witnessed the program from the "red section," was John Shepard Jr., of Lenox, who gave the Festival the 516 beach or deck chairs which help to add color to the interior.

Even 'Celebrities' the Same

Veteran "tipsters" had little to offer in the line of exciting news because the faces of celebrities pointed out by them were as familiar as the generals and admirals who carried us successfully through World War II.

Willard M. Sistaire and his crew of ushers, usherettes, ticket takers and groundsmen did their usual commendable job. The state police, civilian traffic men, chauffeurs, book salesmen and refreshment countermen seemed to assume their former positions and execute their jobs with the same cues they followed in the seven years before the war.

Almost every possible photograph at the Festival has been exhausted on the ground, so The Eagle soared into space yesterday afternoon with its cameraman to record the 1946 story from the air.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his band of musicians graciously acknowledged the ovations of the crowds at all three concerts, leaving one with the full realization that while the Festival hasn't changed in overall appearances, it has rightfully established itself as an industry for an area which needed something to replace the tallyhoes and palatial estates which once served as the only backbone for Southern Berkshire towns which are now bulging at the seams with visitors.

Four Singers Chosen for Berkshire Festival

As a result of auditions last week, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen four singes now studying in the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox to be the soloists in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Ninth Symphony will bring the Festival, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, to a close Aug. 11. The quartet is to include Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Ladcrouto, tenor; James Pease, bass.

The cast is also announced for the three performances of "Peter Grimes," the opera which will have its first American production by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood Aug. 6, 7, 9. "Peter Grimes" was composed for Tanglewood by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute. The leading soprano part (Ellen) will be sung alternately by Florence Manning and Frances Yeend. Balstrode will be sung by James Pease. The cast will include: Ellen Carleen, Irene Jordan, Frances Lehnerts, Mildred Mueller, Phyllis Smith, Duane Crossley, Paul Franke, Robert Gay, Paul Knowles, Matthew Lockart, Robert Long, Leonard Treash and Frederic Zighera.

Eric Crozier, who directed the production at Sadlers Wells in London, and Benjamin Britten, the composer of "Peter Grimes," are both on their way from England to assist in the production here. Richard Rychtarik is the stage designer.

TANGLEWOOD ATWITTER: The forthcoming production of "Peter Grimes" is a main topic of conversation at the Berkshire Music Center these days. Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, is his own accompanist as he directs a scene from the new opera to be given its U.S. premiere the final week of the Berkshire Festival.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
JUL 19 1946

Shostakovich Ninth Flown Here Across A World Still War-Like

World War II may be over, at least officially, but the implements of that war—planes, mines and Liberty ships—all stand out in the story of the arrival in this country of the Symphony No. 9 of Shostakovich.

The latest work by the contemporary Soviet composer is to have its American radio premiere over the American Broadcasting Company networks August 10, in a broadcast from the Berkshire Music Festival.

The journey took six weeks. The manuscript left Moscow on May 16 by plane and was flown over the snow-capped Caucasus Mountains to Sukhumi on the shores of the Black Sea. Another plane took it to Tbilisi, from where it was flown in an old type open bi-plane to Batumi.

A Soviet ship transported the work across the Black Sea to Odessa, dodging mines which still infest that area, and then an American Liberty ship carried it to Poti. From there, an American Victory ship was used to bring it through the Bosphorous, the Sea of Marmora, the Dardanelles and into the Mediterranean, where more floating mines again proved a menace. Past Gibraltar, the ship finally moved into the safe Atlantic and then to New York.

The manuscript reached the offices of the Leeds Music Corporation on June 27 and in less than a week, it was programmed for the final ABC broadcast from the Berkshire Music Festival.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Syhpmony Orchestra will bring the work to American listeners for the first time on the August 10 broadcast.

EAGLE'S WINGS OVER TANGLEWOOD: While 9500 persons attended yesterday afternoon's concert at the Tanglewood Shed, The Eagle's photographer struck a new high note as he soared overhead for pictures. Many of the patrons can be seen on the lawns that surround the Shed. (Jay C. Rosenfeld's review of the concerts will be found on the last page).

'Peter Grimes' Principals Are Selected

Koussevitzky Picks Quartet From Music Center Students

Principals have been selected for the first American performance of the opera, "Peter Grimes," to be given at Tanglewood Aug. 6, 7 and 9, and the quartet for Beethoven's ninth symphony, to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky as the finale of the Berkshire Festival Aug. 11.

As a result of auditions held last week, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen for the quartet four singers now studying in the Berkshire Music Center. The soloists will be Miss Frances Yeend of the state of Washington, soprano; Miss Eunice Alberts, of Brookline, contralto; Joseph Laderoute of Canada, tenor, and James Pease of Indiana, bass.

The title role in "Peter Grimes," written by the British composer, Benjamin Britten, as a commission by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, will be sung alternately by William Horne of New York City and Mr. Laderoute; the leading soprano part (Ellen) by Miss Yeend and Miss Florence Manning of New York.

Other members of the cast will be: Balstrode, Mr. Pease; Miss Ellen Carleen of Audubon, N. J.; Miss Irene Jordan, New York City; Miss Frances Lehnerts, New York; Miss Mildred Mueller, Cleveland, Ohio; Miss Phyllis Smith, Clarksburg, Va.; Duane Crossley, Philadelphia; Paul Franke, New York; Robert Gay, Chicago; Paul Knowles, Cleveland; Matthew Lockhart, Brookline; Robert Long, Seville, Ohio; Leonard Treash, Berea, Ohio; Frederic Zighera, Brookline.

Richard Rychtarik will be stage designer. The composer and Eric Crozier, who directed the world premiere at Sadlers' Wells theatre, London, are on their way to Tanglewood to supervise the production.

Friends of the Berkshire Music Center are invited to request tickets for the opera, for which seats will be reserved.

New Magazine, 'Festival,' Makes Bow in Berkshires

A new magazine dedicated to the Festival season in the Berkshires is making its formal debut at the inaugural production, "Hannele on Journey" in the Rollins Theatre School's Lenox Theatre on the former Gaston Drake estate in Lenox.

Called Festival, the magazine is scheduled to appear three times during the Berkshire Symphonic Festival period and three times during the winter. Leighton Rollins, director of the Rollins School, is editor; Dorothy Dresser of Pittsfield, Republican nominee for state representative, business representative, and Colet McCabe of Lenox, publicity representative of the school, advertising manager.

Volume 1 Number 1 of the new magazine contains articles by Rollins; Douglas Moore, MacDowell professor of music at Columbia University, and others. Programs are carried for the Berkshire Music Center and the Festival, the Berkshire Playhouse in Stockbridge, the Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield. Ted Shawn's Jacob's Pillow, Music Mountain at Falls Village and the Lenox Theatre.

The Berkshire Music Cent

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Director

at TANGLEWOOD

BETWEEN STOCKBRIDGE AND LENOX, MASSACHUSE

Season 1946

PROGRAMMES OF THE

Berkshire Festival

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor . . . . In the Music

Bach=Mozart Concerts

MEMBERS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conducting . . In the Theatre-Concert

Chamber Music Concerts

Under the auspices of the ELIZABETH SPRAGUE COOLIDGE FOUNDATION in the Library of Congress . . . . In the Theatre-Concert Hall

By invitation (See below)

(Evenings at 8:15 . . . Afternoons at 3:30)

BALDWIN PIANO

JUNE 30, S
ercises, B

JULY 2, Tu
Chamber
Wood Director).
Piano, O soon, Op.
for Oboe,
Chamber
ments (Fl Bassoon),
Piano, Ob
Sonata in composer).
Oboe, and

JULY 5, Frid
Center Or

JULY 6, Sa
Music Cen

JULY 9, Tues
Chamber of Ancient Director).
Suite in C sichord).
(Harpischor
Orlando Gi
Domenico S
Jean Philip Tambourin
Handel, So

New Magazine, 'Festival,' Makes Bow in Berkshires

A new magazine dedicated to the Festival season in the Berkshires is making its formal debut at the inaugural production, "Hannele on Journey" in the Rollins Theatre School's Lenox Theatre on the former Gaston Drake estate in Lenox.

Called Festival, the magazine is scheduled to appear three times during the Berkshire Symphonic Festival period and three times during the winter. Leighton Rollins, director of the Rollins School, is editor; Dorothy Dresser of Pittsfield, Republican nominee for state representative, business representative, and Coles McCabe of Lenox, publicity representative of the school, advertising manager.

Volume 1 Number 1 of the new magazine contains articles by Rollins; Douglas Moore, MacDowell professor of music at Columbia University, and others. Programs are carried for the Berkshire Music Center and the Festival, the Berkshire Playhouse in Stockbridge, the Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield, Ted Shawn's Jacob's Pillow, Music Mountain at Falls Village and the Lenox Theatre.

The Berkshire Music Cente

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Director
at TANGLEWOOD
BETWEEN STOCKBRIDGE AND LENOX, MASSACHUSETT

Season 1946

PROGRAMMES OF THE

Berkshire Festival

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor . . . . . . In the Music Shed

Bach=Mozart Concerts

MEMBERS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conducting . . In the Theatre-Concert Hall

Chamber Music Concerts

Under the auspices of the ELIZABETH SPRAGUE COOLIDGE FOUNDATION in the Library of Congress . . . . In the Theatre-Concert Hall

By invitation (See below)

(Evenings at 8:15 . . . Afternoons at 3:30)

BALDWIN PIA

June 30, Sunday Afternoon—*Opening Exercises, Berkshire Music Center.

July 2, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert. (The Berkshire Wood Wind Ensemble, Louis Speyer, Director). Beethoven, Quintet in E-flat, for Piano, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, and Bassoon, Op. 16. Randall Thompson, Suite for Oboe, Clarinet and Viola. Hindemith, Chamber Music for Five Wind Instruments (Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, and Bassoon), Op. 24, No. 2. Poulenc, Trio for Piano, Oboe and Bassoon. Shapero, Piano Sonata in A major, No. 3 (Played by the composer). Rieti, Sonata for Piano, Flute, Oboe, and Bassoon.

July 5, Friday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Concert (Dept. II).

July 6, Saturday Afternoon—*Berkshire Music Center Choral Concert.

July 9, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert (Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, Alfred Zighera, Director). George Philipp Telemann, Suite in C major. (Four viols and harpsichord). J. S. Bach, Sonata in D major (Harpischord and viola da gamba). Orlando Gibbons, Fantasie. (Four viols). Domenico Scarlatti, Sonata in E major. Jean Philippe Rameau, Rigaudons and Tambourin (Harpischord solo). G. F. Handel, Sonata in C major. (Viola da gamba and harpischord). Francois Couperin, La Sultane. (Four viols and harpsichord).

July 11, Thursday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center, Chamber Music and Madrigals.

July 12, Friday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Concert, (Dept. II).

July 13, Saturday Afternoon—*Berkshire Music Center Choral Concert. Saturday Evening—Bach-Mozart Concert (First programme). Mozart, Symphony in B-flat, No. 33 (K. 319). Mozart, Adagio from the Quintet in G minor for Strings (K. 516). Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for String Orchestra (with Sinfonia from the Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden"). Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major. Piano, Lukas Foss Violin, Richard Burgin, Flute, Georges Laurent. Mozart, Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments (K. 361).

July 14, Sunday Morning—*Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music Concert. Sunday Afternoon—Bach-Mozart Concert (First programme, repeated).

July 16, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert (Kroll String Quartet). Beethoven, String Quartet in F minor, Op. 95. Prokofieff, String Quartet No. 2, Op. 92. Haydn, String Quartet in D major, Op. 64, No. 5.

July 18, Thursday Evening—*Opera Scenes by the Opera Workshop.

July 19, Friday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Concert, (Dept. II).

July 20, Saturday Afternoon—*Berkshire Music Center Choral Concert. Saturday Evening—Bach-Mozart Concert (Second programme). Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major. Violin, Richard Burgin, Oboe, Fernand Gillet, Flute, Georges Laurent, Trumpet, Roger Voisin. Mozart, Violin Concerto in A major, No 5 (K. 219). Soloist, William Kroll. Bach, Suite (Overture) in D major, No. 4. Mozart, Symphony ('Jupiter") No. 41 (K. 551).

July 21, Sunday Morning—*Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music Concert. Sunday Afternoon—Bach-Mozart Concert (Second programme, repeated).

July 23, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert, (The Berkshire Chamber Orchestra, Louis Speyer, Director). Assisted by Valentina Vishnevska, Soprano. Soprano Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center, trained by Robert Shaw. Copland, Sextet for Piano, Two Violins, Viola, Violoncello, and Clarinet. Lourie, "Naissance de la Beaute," Cantata (First performance in America). Malipiero, "Le Sette Allegresse d'Amore" (Lorenzo de

(Continued on page 12)

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
JUL 15 1946

Concerts Open At Tanglewood

PITTSFIELD, July 14 — Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston [redacted] its public serie[redacted]certs last night when the Bach-Mozart series began. The program of works by the two masters, played by the small orchestra of Boston Symphony players and conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, was repeated this afternoon.

This morning, the Gregor Piatigorsky's chamber music group played three quartets, and Tuesday evening the Kroll Quartet, under the sponsorship of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, will be heard. Thursday evening the opera department will give its first public performance with scenes from the opera workshop. During the week there will also be four student orchestra concerts.

The Berkshire Museum

PITTSFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS

STUART C. HENRY, Director

July 2 through 31st Exhibition of Works by Edward Melcarth lent by Durlacher Bros.

July 2 through 31st Exhibition of Sculpture by Pupils of Miss Franc Epping and Painting by Pupils of George Picken.

July 2 through 31st Exhibition of Photographs of the Pacific Area by Kingsley R. Fall.

July 3, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "In Old Chicago."

July 5 and 6th, 6 P. M. Mt. Greylock Outing Trip led by Bartlett Hendricks. (other trips July 19 and 20, 27 and 28.)

July 10, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "Foreign Correspondent."

July 13, 1. P. M. Trip to Campbell's Falls, first of three tours led by Arthur Palme.

July 17, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "Ski Chase."

July 23 through August 20th Exhibition History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

July 24, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "Pasteur" with Sacha Guitry, (in French).

July 27, 1 P. M. Everett Caves, second of Berkshire Tours led by Arthur Palme.

July 31, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "The Scarlet Pimpernel."

Through August 20th, Exhibition History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

August 2 through 31st Exhibition, French Impressionist Paintings.

August 2 through 31st Exhibition. Photographs by Charles H. Vickery.

August 2, 8 P. M. Annual Summer Members' Night.

August 7, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "The Prisoner of Zenda."

August 14, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "1812" and "Story of a Transport."

August 21, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "Slalom."

August 28, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "Hedi."

* * *

WILLIAM MILES announces

The Berkshire Playhouse

Season of 1946

On MONDAY, JUNE 24th, the Berkshire Playhouse re-opened for the first time since 1941. Following its successful policy of the past, a different play will be produced each week, with visiting stars supported by the Berkshire Playhouse company. Performances will be given every evening at 8.45. This year there will be matinees every Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30. Season reservations, insuring the same seats each week for every play, are now on sale at $29.40, $18.00 and $12.00, tax included. Reservations may be made by writing, calling at the box office or by telephoning Stockbridge 460.

THE PLAYS

(Ten will be chosen from the following)

"Arsenic and Old Lace," by Joseph Kesselring; "Blithe Spirit," by Noel Coward; "The Constant Wife," by W. Somerset Maugham; "Elizabeth the Queen," by Maxwell Anderson; "The Hasty Heart," by John Patrick, with John Dall; "Kiss and Tell," by [illegible] Hugh Herbert, with Katharine Alexander. "The Late George Apley," by John Marquand and George S. Kaufman, with Leo G. Carroll; "My Sister Eileen," by Joseph Fields and Jerome Chodorov; "Night Must Fall," by Emlyn Williams, with Dame May Whitty; "Off the Air," by Knowles Entrikin and Howard Breslin; "Rebecca," by Daphne DeMaurier, with Florence Reed; "What Every Woman Knows," by Sir James M. Barrie.

THE PLAYERS

(and others to be announced)

Mabel Acker, Mary Mason, Shirley Booth, Mrs. Priestly Morrison, Henry Bulkley, Helen Mullinneaux, Kendall Clark, Emily McNair, Gage Clark, Lenka Peterson, Sayre Crawley, Robert Pike, Virginia Dillon, William Roerick, Lewis Martin, Cynthia Rogers, Ann Mason, Mary Wickes, Efrem Zimbalist, Jr.

Evenings except Sunday at 8.45 $2.94, $1.30, $1.20 (Including tax).

Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2.30, $1.30, $1.20 (Including tax). Box office open daily from 9 A. M. For reservations or information, call, write or telephone Stockbridge 460

The Lenox
The Finest Soda Fountain Service in the Berkshires
Sodas · Luncheonette
Cosmetics, Patent Medicines
Hospital Supplies
Camera Supplies
J. Richard Byrne, Prop.

For Trifles or Treasures
Rosemary Weston
Fine Gifts
Authentic Antiques
56 South Street
Pittsfield, Massachusetts

The Village Inn
Lenox, Mass.
OPEN ALL YEAR
Catering to an Exclusive Clientele at Moderate Rates
A Meal, a Week-End or a Season
Quiet, Pleasant, Attractive
MRS. J. BUNNELL FARNHAM
Telephone Lenox 20

June 30, Sunday Afternoon—*Opening Exercises, Berkshire Music Center.

July 2, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert. (The Berkshire Wood Wind Ensemble, Louis Speyer, Director). Beethoven, Quintet in E-flat, for Piano, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, and Bassoon, Op. 16. Randall Thompson, Suite for Oboe, Clarinet and Viola. Hindemith, Chamber Music for Five Wind Instruments (Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, and Bassoon), Op. 24, No. 2. Poulenc, Trio for Piano, Oboe and Bassoon. Shapero, Piano Sonata in A major, No. 3 (Played by the composer). Rieti, Sonata for Piano, Flute, Oboe, and Bassoon.

July 5, Friday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Concert (Dept. II).

July 6, Saturday Afternoon—*Berkshire Music Center Choral Concert.

July 9, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert (Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, Alfred Zighera, Director). George Philipp Telemann, Suite in C major, (Four viols and harpsichord). J. S. Bach, Sonata in D major (Harpischord and viola da gamba). Orlando Gibbons, Fantasie. (Four viols). Domenico Scarlatti, Sonata in E major. Jean Philippe Rameau, Rigaudons and Tambourin (Harpischord solo). G. F. Handel, Sonata in C major. (Viola da gamba and harpischord). Francois Couperin, La Sultane. (Four viols and harpsichord).

July 11, Thursday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center, Chamber Music and Madrigals.

July 12, Friday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Concert, (Dept. II).

July 13, Saturday Afternoon—*Berkshire Music Center Choral Concert. Saturday Evening—Bach-Mozart Concert (First programme). Mozart, Symphony in B-flat, No. 33 (K. 319). Mozart, Adagio from the Quintet in G minor for Strings (K. 516). Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for String Orchestra (with Sinfonia from the Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden"). Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major. Piano, Lukas Foss Violin, Richard Burgin, Flute, Georges Laurent. Mozart, Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments (K. 361).

July 14, Sunday Morning—*Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music Concert. Sunday Afternoon—Bach-Mozart Concert (First programme, repeated).

July 16, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert (Kroll String Quartet). Beethoven, String Quartet in F minor, Op. 95. Prokofieff, String Quartet No. 2, Op. 92. Haydn, String Quartet in D major, Op. 64, No. 5.

July 18, Thursday Evening—*Opera Scenes by the Opera Workshop.

July 19, Friday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Concert, (Dept. II).

July 20, Saturday Afternoon—*Berkshire Music Center Choral Concert. Saturday Evening—Bach-Mozart Concert (Second programme). Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major. Violin, Richard Burgin, Oboe, Fernand Gillet, Flute, Georges Laurent, Trumpet, Roger Voisin. Mozart, Violin Concerto in A major, No 5 (K. 219). Soloist, William Kroll. Bach, Suite (Overture) in D major, No. 4. Mozart, Symphony ('Jupiter") No. 41 (K. 551).

July 21, Sunday Morning—*Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music Concert. Sunday Afternoon—Bach-Mozart Concert (Second programme, repeated).

July 23, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert, (The Berkshire Chamber Orchestra, Louis Speyer, Director). Assisted by Valentina Vishnevska, Soprano. Soprano Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center, trained by Robert Shaw. Copland, Sextet for Piano, Two Violins, Viola, Violoncello, and Clarinet. Lourie, "Naissance de la Beaute," Cantata (First performance in America). Malipiero, "Le Sette Allegresse d'Amore" (Lorenzo de

(Continued on page 12)

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JUL 15 1946

Concerts Open At Tanglewood

PITTSFIELD, July 14 — Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Stockbridge, [illegible] its public series of concerts last night when the Bach-Mozart series began. The program of works by the two masters, played by the small orchestra of Boston Symphony players and conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, was repeated this afternoon.

This morning, the Gregor Piatigorsky's chamber music group played three quartets, and Tuesday evening the Kroll Quartet, under the sponsorship of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, will be heard. Thursday evening the opera department will give its first public performance with scenes from the opera workshop. During the week there will also be four student orchestra concerts.

The Berkshire Museum

PITTSFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS

STUART C. HENRY, Director

July 2 through 31st Exhibition of Works by Edward Melcarth lent by Durlacher Bros.

July 2 through 31st Exhibition of Sculpture by Pupils of Miss Franc Epping and Painting by Pupils of George Picken.

July 2 through 31st Exhibition of Photographs of the Pacific Area by Kingsley R. Fall.

July 3, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "In Old Chicago."

July 5 and 6th, 6 P. M. Mt. Greylock Outing Trip led by Bartlett Hendricks. (other trips July 19 and 20, 27 and 28.)

July 10, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "Foreign Correspondent."

July 13, 1. P. M. Trip to Campbell's Falls, first of three tours led by Arthur Palme.

July 17, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "Ski Chase."

July 23 through August 20th Exhibition History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

July 24, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "Pasteur" with Sacha Guitry, (in French).

July 27, 1 P. M. Everett Caves, second of Berkshire Tours led by Arthur Palme.

July 31, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "The Scarlet Pimpernel."

Through August 20th, Exhibition History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

August 2 through 31st Exhibition, French Impressionist Paintings.

August 2 through 31st Exhibition. Photographs by Charles H. Vickery.

August 2, 8 P. M. Annual Summer Members' Night.

August 7, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "The Prisoner of Zenda."

August 14, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "1812" and "Story of a Transport."

August 21, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "Slalom."

August 28, 3.15 and 8.15 P. M. Movie, "Hedi."

◆

WILLIAM MILES announces

The Berkshire Playhouse

Season of 1946

On MONDAY, JUNE 24th, the Berkshire Playhouse re-opened for the first time since 1941. Following its successful policy of the past, a different play will be produced each week, with visiting stars supported by the Berkshire Playhouse company. Performances will be given every evening at 8.45. This year there will be matinees every Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30. Season reservations, insuring the same seats each week for every play, are now on sale at $29.40, $18.00 and $12.00, tax included. Reservations may be made by writing, calling at the box office or by telephoning Stockbridge 460.

THE PLAYS

(Ten will be chosen from the following)

"Arsenic and Old Lace," by Joseph Kesselring; "Blithe Spirit," by Noel Coward; "The Constant Wife," by W. Somerset Maugham; "Elizabeth the Queen," by Maxwell Anderson; "The Hasty Heart," by John Patrick, with John Dall; "Kiss and Tell," by Hugh Herbert, with Katharine Alexander. "The Late George Apley," by John Marquand and George S. Kaufman, with Leo G. Carroll; "My Sister Eileen," by Joseph Fields and Jerome Chodorov; "Night Must Fall," by Emlyn Williams, with Dame May Whitty; "Off the Air," by Knowles Entrikin and Howard Breslin; "Rebecca," by Daphne DeMaurier, with Florence Reed; "What Every Woman Knows," by Sir James M. Barrie.

THE PLAYERS

(and others to be announced)

Mabel Acker, Mary Mason, Shirley Booth, Mrs. Priestly Morrison, Henry Bulkley, Helen Mullinneaux, Kendall Clark, Emily McNair, Gage Clark, Lenka Peterson, Sayre Crawley, Robert Pike, Virginia Dillon, William Roerick, Lewis Martin, Cynthia Rogers, Ann Mason, Mary Wickes, Efrem Zimbalist, Jr.

Evenings except Sunday at 8.45 $2.94, $1.30, $1.20 (Including tax).

Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2.30, $1.30, $1.20 (Including tax). Box office open daily from 9 A. M. For reservations or information, call, write or telephone Stockbridge 460

The Lenox
The Finest Soda Fountain Service in the Berkshires
Sodas · Luncheonette
Cosmetics, Patent Medicines
Hospital Supplies
Camera Supplies
J. Richard Byrne, Prop.

For Trifles or Treasures
Rosemary Weston
Fine Gifts
Authentic Antiques
56 South Street
Pittsfield, Massachusetts

The Village Inn
Lenox, Mass.
OPEN ALL YEAR
Catering to an Exclusive Clientele at Moderate Rates
A Meal, a Week-End or a Season
Quiet, Pleasant, Attractive
MRS. J. BUNNELL FARNHAM
Telephone Lenox 20

30, Sunday Afternoon—*Opening Ex-ises, Berkshire Music Center.

2, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge amber Music Concert. (The Berkshire ood Wind Ensemble, Louis Speyer, irector). Beethoven, Quintet in E-flat, for ano, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, and Bas-on, Op. 16. Randall Thompson, Suite r Oboe, Clarinet and Viola. Hindemith, hamber Music for Five Wind Instru-ments (Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, and Bassoon), Op. 24, No. 2. Poulenc, Trio for Piano, Oboe and Bassoon. Shapero, Piano Sonata in A major, No. 3 (Played by the omposer). Rieti, Sonata for Piano, Flute, Oboe, and Bassoon.

LY 5, Friday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Concert (Dept. II).

LY 6, Saturday Afternoon—*Berkshire Music Center Choral Concert.

LY 9, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert (Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, Alfred Zighera, Director). George Philipp Telemann, Suite in C major, (Four viols and harpsichord). J. S. Bach, Sonata in D major (Harpischord and viola da gamba). Orlando Gibbons, Fantasie. (Four viols). Domenico Scarlatti, Sonata in E major. Jean Philippe Rameau, Rigaudons and Tambourin (Harpischord solo). G. F. Handel, Sonata in C major. (Viola da gamba and harpischord). Francois Couperin, La Sultane. (Four viols and harpsichord).

July 11, Thursday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center, Chamber Music and Madrigals.

July 12, Friday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Concert, (Dept. II).

July 13, Saturday Afternoon—*Berkshire Music Center Choral Concert. Saturday Evening—Bach-Mozart Concert (First programme). Mozart, Symphony in B-flat, No. 33 (K. 319). Mozart, Adagio from the Quintet in G minor for Strings (K. 516). Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for String Orchestra (with Sinfonia from the Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden"). Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major. Piano, Lukas Foss Violin, Richard Burgin, Flute, Georges Laurent. Mozart, Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments (K. 361).

July 14, Sunday Morning—*Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music Concert. Sunday Afternoon—Bach-Mozart Concert (First programme, repeated).

July 16, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert (Kroll String Quartet). Beethoven, String Quartet in F minor, Op. 95. Prokofieff, String Quartet No. 2, Op. 92. Haydn, String Quartet in D major, Op. 64, No. 5.

July 18, Thursday Evening—*Opera Scenes by the Opera Workshop.

July 19, Friday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Concert, (Dept. II).

July 20, Saturday Afternoon—*Berkshire Music Center Choral Concert. Saturday Evening—Bach-Mozart Concert (Second programme). Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major. Violin, Richard Burgin, Oboe, Fernand Gillet, Flute, Georges Laurent, Trumpet, Roger Voisin. Mozart, Violin Concerto in A major, No 5 (K. 219). Soloist, William Kroll. Bach, Suite (Overture) in D major, No. 4. Mozart, Symphony ('Jupiter") No. 41 (K. 551).

July 21, Sunday Morning—*Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music Concert. Sunday Afternoon—Bach-Mozart Concert (Second programme, repeated).

July 23, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert, (The Berkshire Chamber Orchestra, Louis Speyer, Director). Assisted by Valentina Vishnevska, Soprano. Soprano Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center, trained by Robert Shaw. Copland, Sextet for Piano, Two Violins, Viola, Violoncello, and Clarinet. Lourie, "Naissance de la Beaute," Cantata (First performance in America). Malipiero, "Le Sette Allegresse d'Amore" (Lorenzo de

(Continued on page 12)

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JUL 15 1946

Concerts Open At Tanglewood

PITTSFIELD, July 14 — Tangle-ood, summer home of the Boston [redacted] its public serie[redacted]certs st night when the Bach-Mozart ries began. The program of works the two masters, played by the all orchestra of Boston Symphony yers and conducted by Serge oussevitzky, was repeated this aft-noon.

This morning, the Gregor Piati-rsky's chamber music group played ree quartets, and Tuesday evening e Kroll Quartet, under the spon-rship of the Elizabeth Sprague olidge Foundation, will be heard. hursday evening the opera depart-nent will give its first public per-rmance with scenes from the opera orkshop. During the week there ill also be four student orchestra ncerts.

A Thirty-three Years Introduction to the Berkshire Music Festival

by The Observer

My twelfth year had in the main been dedicated to rehearsing and finally presenting to a startled group consisting of my parents, a stray cousin or two, and several unsuspecting friends, a "reading" of "The Merchant of Venice". A brown velvet portiere gave my somewhat chubby physique a ponderous mein I could never have achieved without the aid of talents far beyond my capacities. I thoroughly enjoyed myself. The audience itself was not unmoved. That the stifled laugh seemed to predominate in no way embarrassed me, as I recollected in the nick of time that Mother had said that emotions very often prompt strange reactions such as giggling instead of crying or a state of excited stillness! I came to my own conclusions! This memorable performance of mine apparently established the idea in the mind of my aunt, and others less likely to be generous, that I was "artistic." In any event, she offered me, totally unaware of the gems beyond mortal price which she gave without bargain or demur, my first ticket to an orchestral concert. That was thirty-three years ago.

Dr. Karl Muck, looking like the Prince of Darkness in an impeccable morning coat, imperially slim, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra sternly and brilliantly. I was stunned! My near 'teen age state of mind, as imaginative as it was, had never dreamed of such beauty, such a wealth of color and sound.

Thirty-three years ago a fat boy of twelve heard his first concert. Friday following Friday he stole into Symphony Hall as the pious tiptoe into church. Gradually he came to know the names of the composers and what they had written. It was with a sense of personal loss that he heard the Funeral March from the Eroica played in memory of Boston's greatly loved and honored Major Henry Lee Higginson. It was he who sustained the musicians and molded a great future for the Boston Orchestra.

Years passed, the orchestra took on new life and vitality. Koussevitzky had arrived!

I remember as if it was yesterday, the day and hour, the smile on her face, when Madame Higginson told me that Koussevitzky had called on her and thanked her for her husband's great gift to music, to musicians and to an expectant audience. Madame Higginson was deeply touched.

The reign of Koussevitzky began. A fine orchestra became a great orchestra. There are many who believe that in the "Koussevitzky concerts" we have the perfect example of greatness married to greatness. The informed critic and the adoring audience often is heard pronouncing superlatives: "The greatest orchestra in the world, led by the greatest living conductor in the world!" So be it.

This memory of thirty-three years of devoted attendance upon orchestral concerts and in particular the Boston Symphony concerts is not plotted to prove any point except one: that there is no joy upon earth equal to attending orchestral concerts superlatively planned, superlatively executed.

Koussevitzky and the Boston men today are as well known in America as once they were known in Symphony Hall where the Greek Gods continue to look down upon them with impersonal blessings.

The Berkshire Music Festival at "Tanglewood," Lenox, Massachusetts, in the Berkshires, has made the Boston orchestra a household word of blessing and recognition wherever good music is known and loved. Elsewhere in this first issue of FESTIVAL you will find a detailed announcement of the 1946 Music Festival again making history under the magic baton of Dr. Koussevitzky.

I like to think that Madame Higginson, sitting with her husband in their box upon the parapet of Heaven, leans forward, touches her Major's sleeve and speaks, "Henry, the war is over. Thank God. Tonight 'they' play the Beethoven Seventh. My dear, isn't the lake beautiful and how tall the pines are. If you will not suspect me of disloyalty, I must confess, I believe this setting is nobler, even, than your Symphony Hall."

Ostensibly the war is over. We are free again to enter "Tanglewood" to listen again to the wit, the soul, the heart of the Boston orchestra, disciplined by the genius of Koussevitzky as together they make revelation a daily occurrence.

Serge Koussevitzky

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at "Tanglewood".

June 30, Sunday Afternoon—*Opening Exercises, Berkshire Music Center.

July 2, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert. (The Berkshire Wood Wind Ensemble, Louis Speyer, Director). Beethoven, Quintet in E-flat, for Piano, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, and Bassoon, Op. 16. Randall Thompson, Suite for Oboe, Clarinet and Viola. Hindemith, Chamber Music for Five Wind Instruments (Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, and Bassoon), Op. 24, No. 2. Poulenc, Trio for Piano, Oboe and Bassoon. Shapero, Piano Sonata in A major, No. 3 (Played by the composer). Rieti, Sonata for Piano, Flute, Oboe, and Bassoon.

July 5, Friday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Concert (Dept. II).

July 6, Saturday Afternoon—*Berkshire Music Center Choral Concert.

July 9, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert (Boston Society of Ancient Instruments, Alfred Zighera, Director). George Philipp Telemann, Suite in C major, (Four viols and harpsichord). J. S. Bach, Sonata in D major (Harpischord and viola da gamba). Orlando Gibbons, Fantasie. (Four viols). Domenico Scarlatti, Sonata in E major. Jean Philippe Rameau, Rigaudons and Tambourin (Harpischord solo). G. F. Handel, Sonata in C major. (Viola da gamba and harpischord). Francois Couperin, La Sultane. (Four viols and harpsichord).

July 11, Thursday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center, Chamber Music and Madrigals.

July 12, Friday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Concert, (Dept. II).

July 13, Saturday Afternoon—*Berkshire Music Center Choral Concert. Saturday Evening—Bach-Mozart Concert (First programme). Mozart, Symphony in B-flat, No. 33 (K. 319). Mozart, Adagio from the Quintet in G minor for Strings (K. 516). Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for String Orchestra (with Sinfonia from the Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden"). Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major. Piano, Lukas Foss Violin, Richard Burgin, Flute, Georges Laurent. Mozart, Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments (K. 361).

July 14, Sunday Morning—*Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music Concert. Sunday Afternoon—Bach-Mozart Concert (First programme, repeated).

July 16, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert (Kroll String Quartet). Beethoven, String Quartet in F minor, Op. 95. Prokofieff, String Quartet No. 2, Op. 92. Haydn, String Quartet in D major, Op. 64, No. 5.

July 18, Thursday Evening—*Opera Scenes by the Opera Workshop.

July 19, Friday Evening—*Berkshire Music Center Orchestrá Concert, (Dept. II).

July 20, Saturday Afternoon—*Berkshire Music Center Choral Concert. Saturday Evening—Bach-Mozart Concert (Second programme). Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major. Violin, Richard Burgin, Oboe, Fernand Gillet, Flute, Georges Laurent, Trumpet, Roger Voisin. Mozart, Violin Concerto in A major, No 5 (K. 219). Soloist, William Kroll. Bach, Suite (Overture) in D major, No. 4. Mozart, Symphony ('Jupiter") No. 41 (K. 551).

July 21, Sunday Morning—*Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music Concert. Sunday Afternoon—Bach-Mozart Concert (Second programme, repeated).

July 23, Tuesday Evening—*Coolidge Chamber Music Concert, (The Berkshire Chamber Orchestra, Louis Speyer, Director). Assisted by Valentina Vishnevska, Soprano. Soprano Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center, trained by Robert Shaw. Copland, Sextet for Piano, Two Violins, Viola, Violoncello, and Clarinet. Lourie, "Naissance de la Beaute," Cantata (First performance in America). Malipiero, "Le Sette Allegresse d'Amore" (Lorenzo de

(Continued on page 12)

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
[illegible] UNION

JUL 15 1946

Concerts Open At Tanglewood

ITTSFIELD, July 14 — Tangle- ood, summer home of the Boston [illegible] in [illegible] its public serie[illegible]certs st night when the Bach-Mozart ries began. The program of works the two masters, played by the all orchestra of Boston Symphony yers and conducted by Serge oussevitzky, was repeated this aft- noon.

This morning, the Gregor Piati- orsky's chamber music group played ree quartets, and Tuesday evening he Kroll Quartet, under the sponorship of the Elizabeth Sprague oolidge Foundation, will be heard. hursday evening the opera department will give its first public performance with scenes from the opera orkshop. During the week there ill also be four student orchestra oncerts.

Jacob's Pillow

In the first summer after the war the Jacob's Pillow University of the Dance and Dance Festival, near Lee, Mass, is to come forth with a greatly increased schedule.

The school opens July first and beginning July 5, there will be a concert every Friday and Saturday afternoon at 4 o'clock through September 7. Each program will be divided more or less generally between ethnic dance, ballet and modern dance, and the first five week-ends are scheduled as follows:

July 5 and 6—La Meri, Rosella Hightower and George Skibine, Barton Mumaw.

July 12 and 13—La Meri and group, Albia Kavan and Rex Cooper, Valerie Bettis.

July 19 and 20—La Meri, a ballet group to be announced, Trudy Goth and Henry Schwarze.

July 26 and 27—La Meri, Alicia Markova and Anton Dolin, Ted Shawn.

August 2 and 3—La Meri (gesture songs), Grant Mouradoff, Sonia Wojcikowska and Virginia Richardson; Arthur Mahoney and Thalia Mara.

In addition to this series there will also be a series of performances of opera ballet, operas and excerpts from operas under the management of Rosamond Chapin. Paul Weiner is musical director and Friedelind Wagner stage director. The events that are scheduled from July 21 to August 25 include "Tristan and Isolde," "The Great Harem Snatch," and excerpts from "Lakme," "Lohengrin," "Aida," "Tannhauser," and "Indian Summer." The performances are at 4:30.

A partial list of dancers appearing at the Jacob's Pillow Theatre includes La Meri, Rosella Hightower, George Skibine, Barton Mumaw, Albia Kavan, Rex Cooper, Valerie Bettis, Trudy Goth, Henry Schwarze, Alicia Markova, Anton Dolin, Ted Shawn, Grant Muradoff, Sonia Wojcikowska, Virginia Richmond, Arthur Mahoney, Thalia Mara, Kurt and Grace Graff, Iva Kitchell and many others.

◆

Bradford House Club
Incorporated
Lenox-Pittsfield Rd., Lenox, Mass.
Telephone Lenox 8391

- Dining Room
- Cocktail Lounge
- Rooms with Private Baths

MEMBERS AND GUESTS

Have you discovered your child's tal[illegible]?
They will be discovered and developed at BROOKSIDE
IN THE BERKSH[illegible]ES
The Progressive Scho[illegible]
Boys and Girls a[illegible]
Great Barrington, M[illegible]
Enter your child in Brookside's Su[illegible] Cam[illegible] in preparation for the Fall pr[illegible]
Music · Art · Dancing [illegible] Sports
Vocational Training and All Academic Subjects
Write Dr. I. Altaraz, Director, for information

The South Mountain Association
Four Wednesday Evening Concerts

June 26, July 3, 10, 17, at 9:30 o'clock

July 3, 10 and 17— Soloists, Jeanne Therrien, Pianist; Anahid Ajemian, Violinist; Eleanor Gough, Pianist; Ruth Geiger, Pianist; Dorothy Minty, Violinist; Bertha Melnick, Pianist.
at 8.30 o'clock

Berkshire Museum, Pittsfield, Mass.

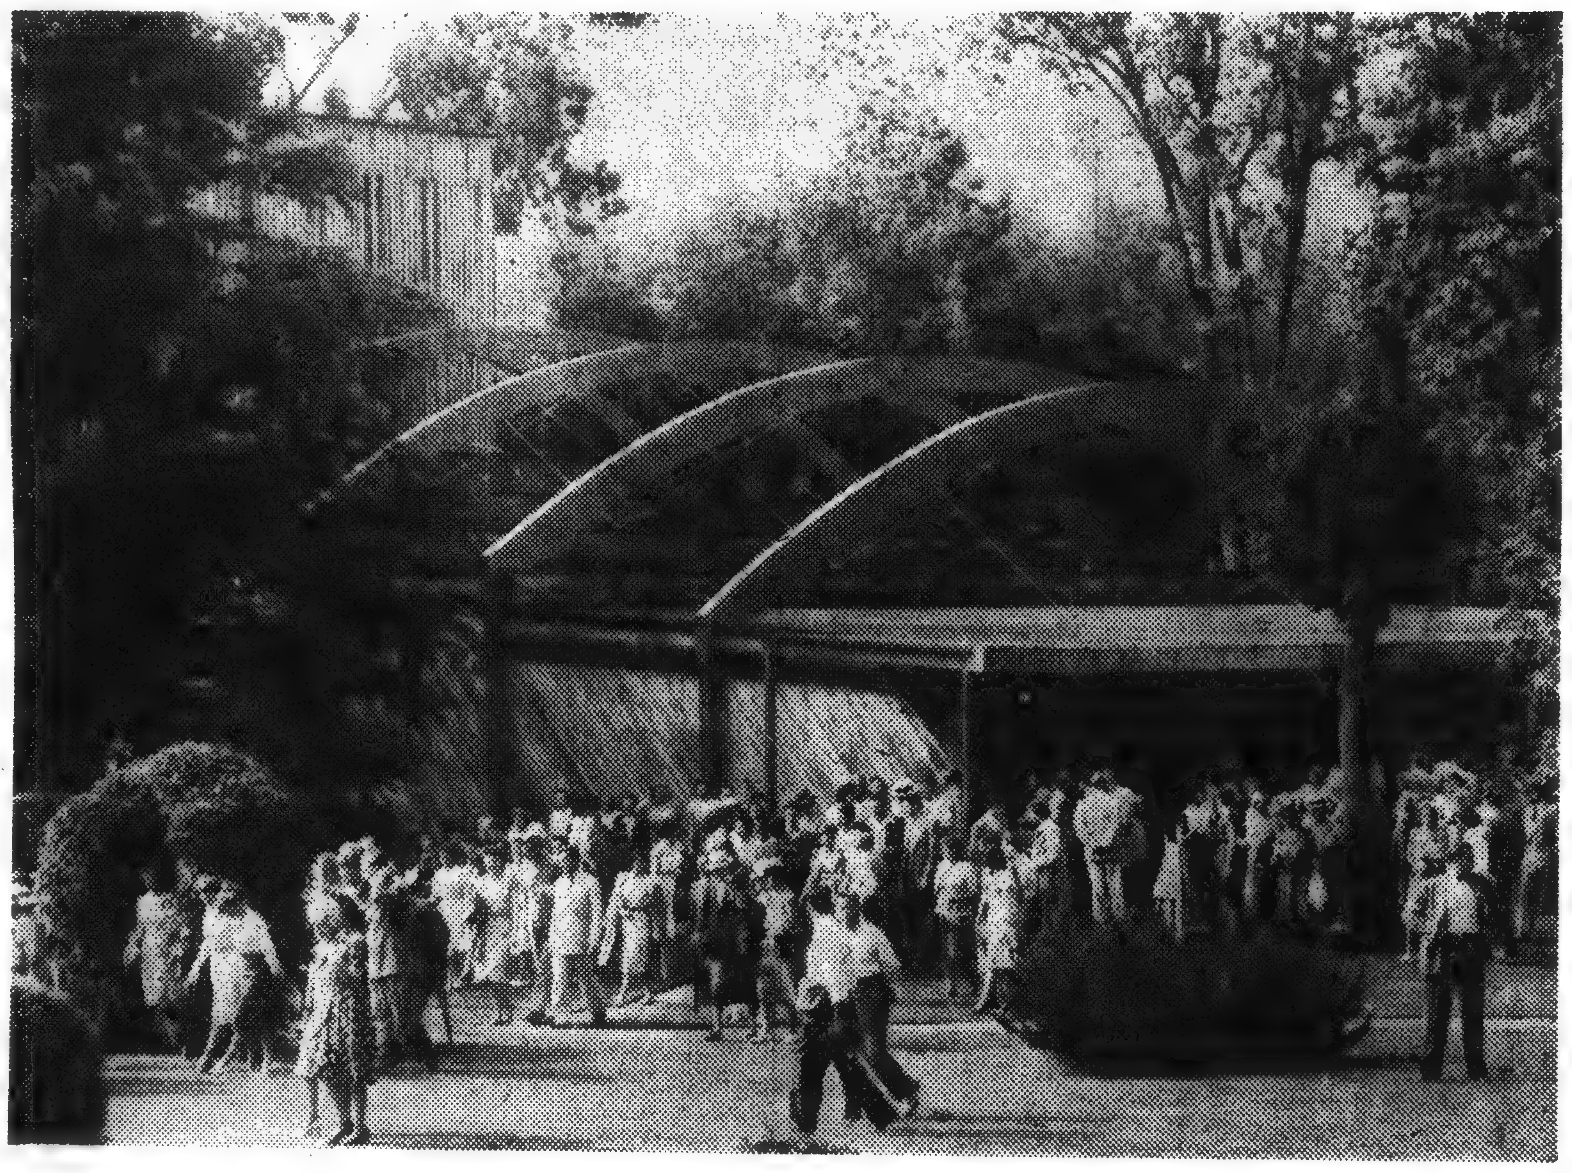
For reserved seats call the Museum, Pittsfield 2-6373.

The Yellow Aster
Pittsfield-Lenox Road
Pittsfield, Massachusetts
Dinner, 5.30 to 8.30
Cocktail [illegible]
PARTY ACCOMMODATIONS
For Reservations Telephone 9277
Mr. and Mrs. A. [illegible], Owners

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 19 1946

Tanglewood Plans Premieres



Lenox, July 19—A Tanglewood audience leaves the theater where the American premiere of "Peter Grimes," the Benjamin Britten opera, will be given August 6. The second week of the Bach-Mozart concerts starts tomorrow in the theater. The program for tomorrow night and Sunday afternoon includes the Second Bach Brandenburg Concerto; the Mozart A Major Violin Concerto with William Kroll as soloist; the Bach Suite (Overture) in D major; and the Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony. The Boston orchestra opens the festival proper Thursday night in the shed. The program inludes the American premiere of the Shostakovich Ninth Symphony, the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony and the first movement from the Shostakovich Sixth Symphony.

Patronage for Music

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Dr. Koussevitzky in his address at the opening of the music school at Tanglewood made a powerful appeal in favor of government aid to the musical arts.

Those who are familiar with the history of the advancement of the arts in Europe realize the immense debt we all owe to the aid given to music by kings, princes and governments. The fame of Vienna, Dresden and Munich as great musical centers undoubtedly has been due to such aid.

The Berkshires have become famous now as a music center of great distinction. Under the inspiration of Dr. Koussevitzky and the wise direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Association this center is bound to attain world fame.

We would seem warranted in appealing to the governor of Massachusetts to make certain that this laudable enterprise should receive the whole-hearted support of the people of Massachusetts. I would suggest therefore that organized agitation for this appeal should properly begin right here in the Berkshires and specifically in the county seat of Pittsfield. The Berkshire Eagle might fittingly serve as the leader in this movement just at this time when Tanglewood will be the greatest musical center of national interest.

PHILIP MARSHALL BROWN.
Williamstown.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

JUL 2 0 1946

Koussevitzky again conducts the Boston Symphony tonight (WRNL 8:30-9:30). This will be the second of two broadcasts of music by Mozart and Bach, in which he has reduced his ensemble to one comparable to the times when the scores were created. Next week, Koussevitzky will have the complete orchestra before him for the first of three festival broadcasts from the Berkshire Music Festival. The season will end on Aug. 10 with the Boston presenting the American premiere of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9.

Bach-Mozart Finale To Be This Week End

July 19

Koussevitzky To Conduct Principals Of Boston Orchestra

The second and last program in the Bach-Mozart series of concerts at Tanglewood will be given at Tanglewood tomorrow evening at 8.15 and repeated Sunday afternoon at 3.30. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, most of them members of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

Tickets are on sale at the box office, England Brothers book department, the Curtis Hotel, Lenox; the Blue Bird Sport Shop, Stockbridge; the Chamber of Commerce booth, Great Barrington.

The program follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major, Bach
Allegro moderato
Andante
Allegro
Solo violin: Richard Burgin
Flute: Georges Laurent
Oboe: Fernand Gillet
Trumpet: Roger Voisin
Violin concerto in A major, No. 5 (K. 219), Mozart
Allegro aperto
Adagio
Tempo di menuetto
Soloist: William Kroll

Intermission

Suite (overture) in D major, No. 4..Bach Overture
Bourree I, II
Minuet I, II
Adagio
Rejouissance
Symphony, Jupiter, No. 41 (K. 551), Mozart
Allegro vivace
Andante cantabile
Menuetto: Allegro
Molto allegro

Nearly 1000 students and members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center attended the first program of the season by the opera workshop of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood last evening.

Students of the department, directed by Boris Goldovsky, did scenes from seven operas, including Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"; a duet from the second act of Verdi's "Aida"; a duet and trio from Act 2 of Mozart's "Don Giovanni"; excerpts from Masagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana"; duet from Act 2 of Smetana's "The Bartered Bride"; excerpt from Act 1 of Puccini's "La Boheme"; and Scene 1 from Menotti's "The Old Maid and the Thief," under the direction of Leonard Treash.

Between numbers Mr. Goldovsky commented upon the scene to follow.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JUL 20 1946

The First Reader

Linking Past with Present

Literature and Music Serve to Give Us More Cultural Enrichment

By HARRY HANSEN.

If you are going to attend the Berkshire music festival—and if your path lies in other directions—take with you a copy of The Tale of Tanglewood, a book in which Mark A. DeWolfe Howe links the literary past of Stockbridge, Mass., with the musical present and brings evidence of the continuing cultural enrichment of American life.

Books dealing with social crises, rather than cultural achievement, arrest the eye and get the headlines until you begin to think the country is going to the dogs. Yet this little book tells how appreciation of the Berkshire music festivals has grown with the years and carries the encouraging optimism of both Mr. Howe and Serge Koussevitzky, who have seen good music survive the worst of wars. Mr. Howe has been a trustee of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 28 years. The orchestra came to Tanglewood in 1937.

The literary associations of Tanglewood are described by Mr. Howe. Hawthorne gave the name to the Tappan house when he wrote A Wonder Book for Boys and Girls, and put the word into the mouths of generations of school children when he wrote Tanglewood Tales. The Hawthornes lived in the Red Cottage which stood over the line from Lenox in Stockbridge in 1850-51, and there he also wrote The House of the Seven Gables.

Mr. Howe has given significance to two thunderstorms that hit the Berkshire hills on widely different dates. During the first, in 1850, Hawthorne and Herman Melville, meeting for the first time, took refuge in a crevice of the rocks and talked for two hours and "laid the basis for a rapidly ensuing intimacy." During the second, in 1937, the festival orchestra was trying to play Wagner in a tent, and the storm provoked an immediate campaign for a permanent music auditorium, which was realized.

The Hawthorne cottage at Tanglewood was destroyed by fire about 40 years after he lived in it. Lately "an exact reproduction" has been built. Eventually all America will be full of exact reproductions of this and that building, all of them properly air-conditioned and fitted with modern lighting devices. But Hawthorne and his little circle are gone.

The account of the music festivals should interest any lover of constructive activities. In 1944 and 1945 "the thread of continuity ran a little thin," as Mr. Howe describes the difficulty of getting audiences during the war. In those years two smaller festivals of Bach and Mozart music were attempted. This year's major programs open with the Beethoven Eroica symphony and the Shostakovitch fifth symphony on Thursday, July 25 with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The final program will be given Aug. 11. (Vanguard Press, $2.)

CORNING, N. Y.
LEADER

JUL 20 1946

Festival Broadcast To Open On July 27

The first of three festival broadcasts, via WJZ-ABC, from The Berkshire Music Festival will be presented on Saturday, July 27, 9:30 to 10:30 p.m., when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returns to the podium of the Boston Symphony orchestra. For the first time since the season closed last Spring, Dr. Koussevitzky will have his complete orchestra before him.

Two previous broadcasts from the Berkshire Music Festival have been devoted to programs of Bach and Mozart and the Boston leader reduced his ensemble to one comparable to the times when these scores were created.

For the initial festival broadcast, Dr. Koussevitzky has selected Eugene List, young American pianist, as soloist. He will be heard in the familiar Piano Concerto No. 2 of Rachmaninoff.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

JUL 2 0 1946

Koussevitzky to Conduct Bach-Mozart Broadcast

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the final broadcast of the Bach-Mozart series at the Berkshire Music Festival at 9:30 tonight on WFMJ from Tangelwood, Mass.

The following week and for two weeks thereafter the programs, with the complete Boston Symphony Orchestra, will broadcast under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. Tonight's program comprises the D major Suite No. 4 of Bach and the familiar "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart.

Labor Secretary Lewis B. Schwellenbach and Representative Henry Jackson (D., Wash.) will participate in a discussion on "Our Foreign Policy" at 7 p. m. on KDKA and 11 p. m. on WTAM. Sterling Fisher will be moderator. The topic scheduled is "Maritime Labor and World Trade."

Music Will Fill the Air Next Week

Bach-Mozart, Tonight And Tomorrow; Festival Thursday

Beginning the fourth week of the Berkshire Music Center, events at Tanglewood will come thick and fast. At least one concert is scheduled for every day, and some days two and even three.

The second Bach-Mozart concert tonight at 8.15 will be repeated tomorrow afternoon at 3.30. Gregor Piatigorsky's chamber music group will give a program tomorrow morning. On Monday evening, in the Shed, the Department 5 orchestra, directed by Richard Burgin, will give its first concert and Tuesday evening the Berkshire Chamber Orchestra, directed by Louis Speyer, will give the last of four weekly programs under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will open the first Berkshire Festival since 1941 on Thursday night, with the second and third concerts on Saturday night and Sunday afternoon. There will be a lecture-recital, illustrated by piano and lantern on Thursday at 4.30 by Alfred V. Frankenstein, music editor of the San Francisco Chronicle. With Julius Katchan, a student, at the piano, Mr. Frankenstein will show slides of pictures that inspired Moussorgsky's "Pictures of an Exhibition" that will be played by the orchestra Thursday evening.

On Friday afternoon at 4.30 Olin Downes, music editor of the New York Times, will give the second of four lectures on "The Art of Criticism." The symphony concert by the school orchestra, scheduled for Friday evening, will be postponed to the following week.

The rehearsal Saturday morning at 10 by the Boston Orchestra will be open to the public at a nominal fee for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Special rates will be given to students and to adults accompanying four or more students.

Saturday afternoon the fourth concert by the choral group, trained and directed by Robert Shaw, will be held in the theater-concert hall.

All student concerts and Mr. Frankenstein's lecture-recital will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

More than 2000 students and Friends of the Center heard the symphony concert last evening in the Shed, when members of Dr. Koussevitzky's class in conducting led the 115 players in the Department 2 orchestra.

Programs follow for the chamber music concert tomorrow morning and the orchestral concert Monday evening.

Sunday Morning

Piano Quintet (1944) .... Martinu
Suite for Wind Quintet, Opus 37
Oscar Lorenzo Fernandes
String Quartet No. 6 in D minor—
Death and the Maiden ... Schubert

Monday Evening

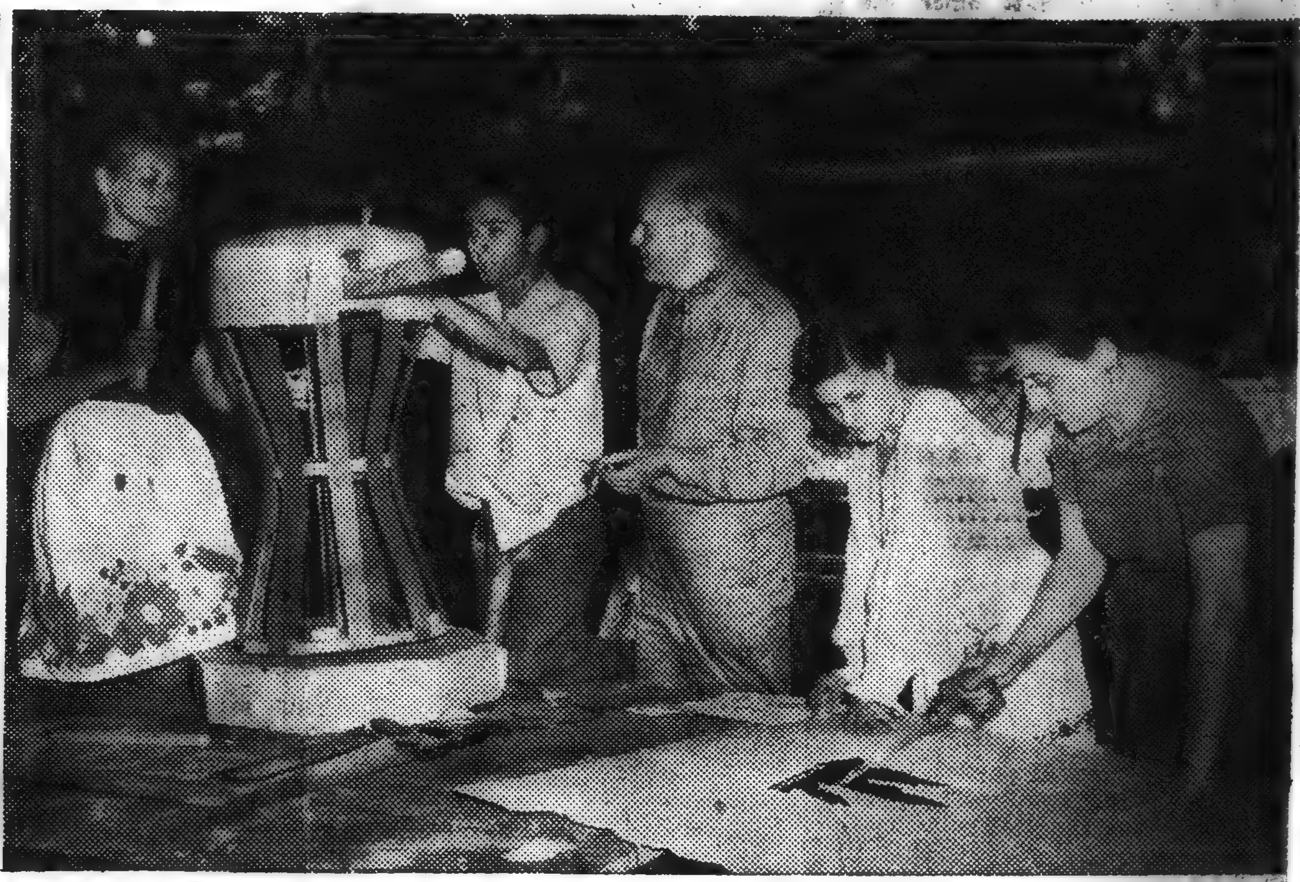
Symphony No. 88 .... Haydn
Concerto for Piano, No. 3 ..... Beethoven
Soloist, Abba Bogin
Petit Suite .... Debussy
Musical Pictures—Suite from the Opera,
The Tale of Tsar Saltan
Rimsky-Korsakov

14—The Berkshire Evening Eagle, Saturday, July 20, 1946

Music Center at Tanglewood Hums With Activity

Berkshire County students study score: Joseph Pizzonia, Daniel Secunda, Gloria Brochin, Pittsfield; Madeline Gabron, Lenox; Warren Rich, Pittsfield.

Cross Centamore (center) of Roxbury reads score as James Harnett of Boston practices double bass outside festival shed.



Richard Rychtarik (above) supervises Kathy Sanger of East Orange, N. J., and Mark Sandrich of Hollywood, Cal., as they make a capstan for "Peter Grimes." Nicolette Ysaye of New York City and Mrs. Louis Speyer (right) wife of faculty member, construct a fireplace.

At Tracy Hall (lower left) Jake Glazer of Milwaukee, Wis., and Robert Nagel, an ex-GI of Pittsburgh, in their self-maintained quarters.

Robert Shaw (lower right) directs rehearsal of the chorus for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to be sung at final festival concert Aug. 11.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 20 1946

Boxholder List At Tanglewood Festival Given

Lenox, Mass.—The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will open Thursday. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will give the first performance in America of Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony.

Box holders for all the concerts for this season from Thursday to Aug. 11 include:

Mrs. Ramsay C. Hoguet, New York and Stockbridge; Mrs. E. Griswold Hollister, Toledo and Lenox; Walter Hoving, New York and Stockbridge; Dr. Harold T. Hyman, New York; Mrs. Edwin C. Jameson, New York and Sharon, Conn.; Mrs. E. A. Jones, Pittsfield; Miss Marion Kemp, New York; Mr and Mrs. John Kennedy, New York and Lenox; Mrs C. Davie Lloyd, Lee and Kinderhook, N. Y.; Harry F. McRell, Pittsfield; Gordon Mendelssohn, Millbrook, N. Y.; Mr. and Mrs. D. P. Morgan, New York and Stockbridge; Mrs John S. Newberry, Grosse Point Farms, Mich.; T. C. Adler, Cincinnati and Middlebury, Vt.; Anna Alexandre, New York and Lenox; Mr. and Mrs. William Felton Barrett, New York and Great Barrington; Mrs. Thomas H. Blodgett Great Barrington; John Nicholas Brown, Providence and Newport, R. I.; Mrs. Norval H. Busey Jr., New York and Lee; Mr. and Mrs. William C. Cannon, New York and Salisbury, Conn.; Miss Mabel Choate, New York and Stockbridge; Mr. and Mrs. Laurence R. Connor, Pittsfield; Mrs. Walter S. Crandall, Bronxville, N. Y. and Chatham, N. Y.; Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Crane, Dalton; Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop M. Crane Jr., Dalton.

Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Chestnut Hill and Center Harbor, N. H.; Mrs. Myron F. Taylor, Locust Valley, N. Y.; Mr. and Mrs. Archibald McLeish, Conway, Mass.; Mrs. Leonard Clark Feathers, New York; Mr. and Mrs. John S. Williams, Old Chatham, N. Y.; Mr. and Mrs. Lester Roberts, Lenox; Mr. and Mrs. John A. Shepard Jr., Palm Beach and Lenox; Mrs. George W. Hockwood, New York and Stockbridge; Mrs. John Barry Ryan, Stockbridge; Mrs. Clarence A. Warden, Haverford, Pa. and Lenox; E. J. Glynn, Willimansett; Mrs. Donald J. Wasner, Miss Edith Scoville, Salisbury, Conn.; Mrs. Norman Scott, New York and Stockbridge; Mrs. John L. Senior, Chicago and Lenox; Mr. and Mrs. Heaton I. Treadway, Stockbridge; Mr. and Mrs. John F. Treadway, Williamstown.

Box holders for the first series from July 25 to 28 inclusive are:

Mr. and Mrs. Philip Marshall Brown, Washington and Williamstown; Mrs. Charles A. Cass, New York; Mrs. David T. Dana, Miss Ellen Bullard, Boston and Lenox; E. V. Johnson, West Granby, Conn.; Mr. and Mrs. Carey R. Kinney, Pittsfield; Mrs. William Mather Lewis, Colebrook, Conn.; A. J. Rosenstein, West Hartford, Conn.; Dr. Walter von Horst, Rego Park, New York and Housatonic; Mr. and Mrs. Robert K. Wheeler, Great Barrington; Raymond S. Wilkins, Boston; Chauncey Stillman, New York and Amenia, N. Y.; Mrs. and Mr. Henry B. Sawyer, Boston.

The second series, Aug. 1, 3, 4, has the following box holders:

Mr. and Mrs. Philip Allen, Boston; Mr. and Mrs. M. J. Warner, Pine Orchard, Conn.; Mrs. Edwin DeL. Battles, Waterville, Oneida Co., N. Y.; Mr. and Mrs. Stanley P. Benton, Pittsfield; Mrs. L. V. Randall, Montreal; Mrs. William Rosenblatt, New York and Great Barrington.

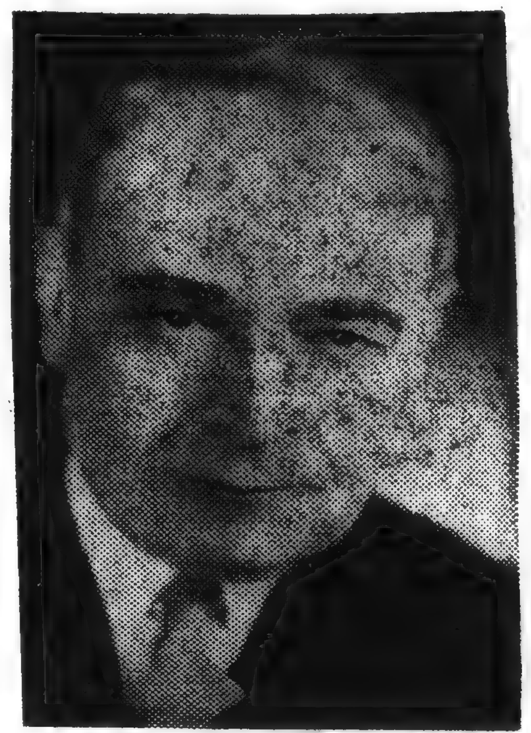
For third series, Aug. 8, 9, 11, are:

Mrs. John C. Breckenridge, Santa Barbara, Calif.; Mrs. Alvin T. Fuller, Boston and Rye Beach, N. H.; Mrs. Franklin Hobbs, Boston and Marion, Mass.; Mrs. Montgomery Hare, St. James, L. I.; Mrs. Alfred G. Kay, Chester; Herman Lowin, New York; Mrs. A. G. Drexel Paul, Radnor, Pa.; Henry J. Reed, New York.

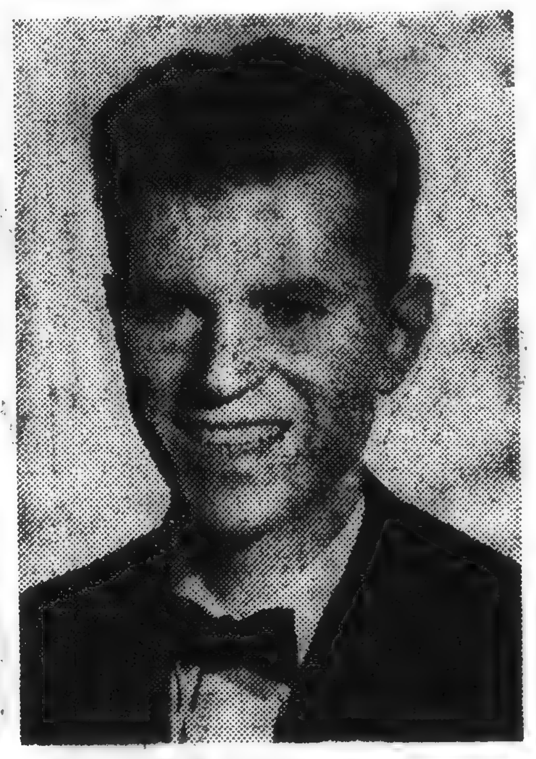
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 21 1946

Participate in Festival



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY



EUGENE LIST

The Berkshire Music festival will be formally opened Thursday evening with the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, playing two works by Sjostakovitch. Saturday evening's program will have Eugene List, pianist, as soloist.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 21 1946

Bach-Mozart Concert Today At Tanglewood

The final program in the Bach-Mozart series will be given at Tanglewood this afternoon at 3.30:—

Brandenburg concerto No. 2 in F major ... Bach

Richard Burgin, violin; George Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Roger Voisin, trumpet.

Violin concerto in A major, No. 5 (K. 219) ... Mozart

William Kroll, Soloist

Suite in D major No. 4 .... Bach

Symphony (Jupiter) No. 41 (K. 551) ... Mozart

The fourth and final of the chamber concerts which will take place on Tuesday night at 8.15 will be as follows:—

The Berkshire Chamber Orchestra
Louis Speyer, Conductor
Assisted by Valentina Vishnevska, Soprano

Soprano chorus of the Berkshire Music center trained by Robert Shaw.

Sextet for piano, two violins, viola, violoncello and clarinet .... Copland

"Naissance de la Beaute," cantata .. Lourie
(First performance in America)

"Le Sette Allegresse d'Amore" (Lorenzo de Medici) .... Malipiero
For soprano and 14 instruments
(Dedicated to Mrs Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge.)
(First performance)

Divertissement for 15 instruments .. Ibert

First and second series box holders include:

Mrs. Charles M. Andrews, East Dover, Vt., and New Haven; Mr. and Mrs. Samuel G. Colt, Pittsfield; Mrs. Edward S. Harkness, New York; Mr. and Mrs. Owen Johnson, Stockbridge; Mr. and Mrs. David Brewer Karrich, Washington and Stockbridge.

Those having boxes at first and third series are:

Mrs. Beatrice Fox Auerbach, Hartford, Conn.; Mrs. Charles C. Griswold, New York and Stockbridge; Mrs. Charles A. Proctor, Swampscott; Peter Schweitzer, New York and Monterey.

Mrs. Henry Ivison Parsons, Clearwater, Fla. and Stockbridge: has a box for the second and third series.

The following are box holders for single concerts:

Col. Arthur D. Budd, West Hartford and Windsor; W. S. Albershein, Interlaken, N. J.; Emil Herrman, New York; Miss Caroline E. Irons, Oakland, Calif.; Mrs. Cole Porter, New York and Williamstown; Mr. and Mrs. Leighton Rollins, New York and Lenox; George A. Kennedy, Montreal; Miss Josephine Tarafa, Litchfield, Conn.; Mrs. W. Rockwood Gibbs, Richmond, Mass.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM

JUL 21 1946

Boston Symphony Will Give Premiere of Russian Work

BY OLIN DOWNERS.

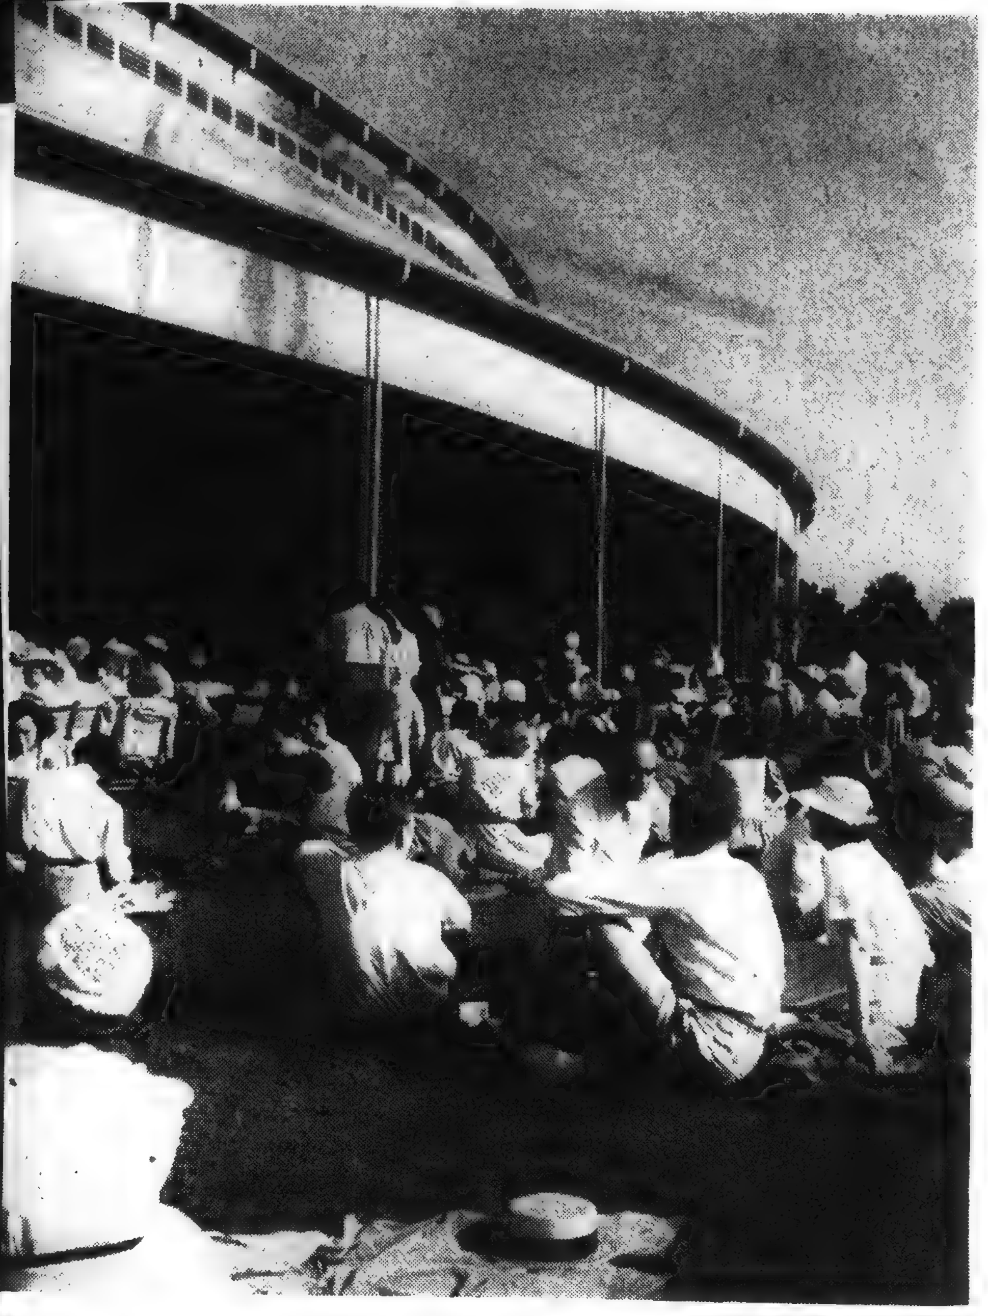
(Copyright, 1946, by the N. Y. Times.)

NEW YORK, July 20.—The two most important symphonies that have come from Russia — that country which has been the most productive of music of all the great nations engaged in the war —figure on the programs of the coming weeks of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. One of these is Prokofieff's fifth symphony, introduced here last season by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. The other is Shostakovich's ninth symphony, which will be given its American premiere by the same forces Thursday at Stockbridge, Mass.

This ninth symphony, in its very modest proportions, implies an important change in Shostakovich's creative procedure. It is a work of approximately 25 minutes in contradistinction to his earlier works in the form, which became longer with each essay up to the eighth.

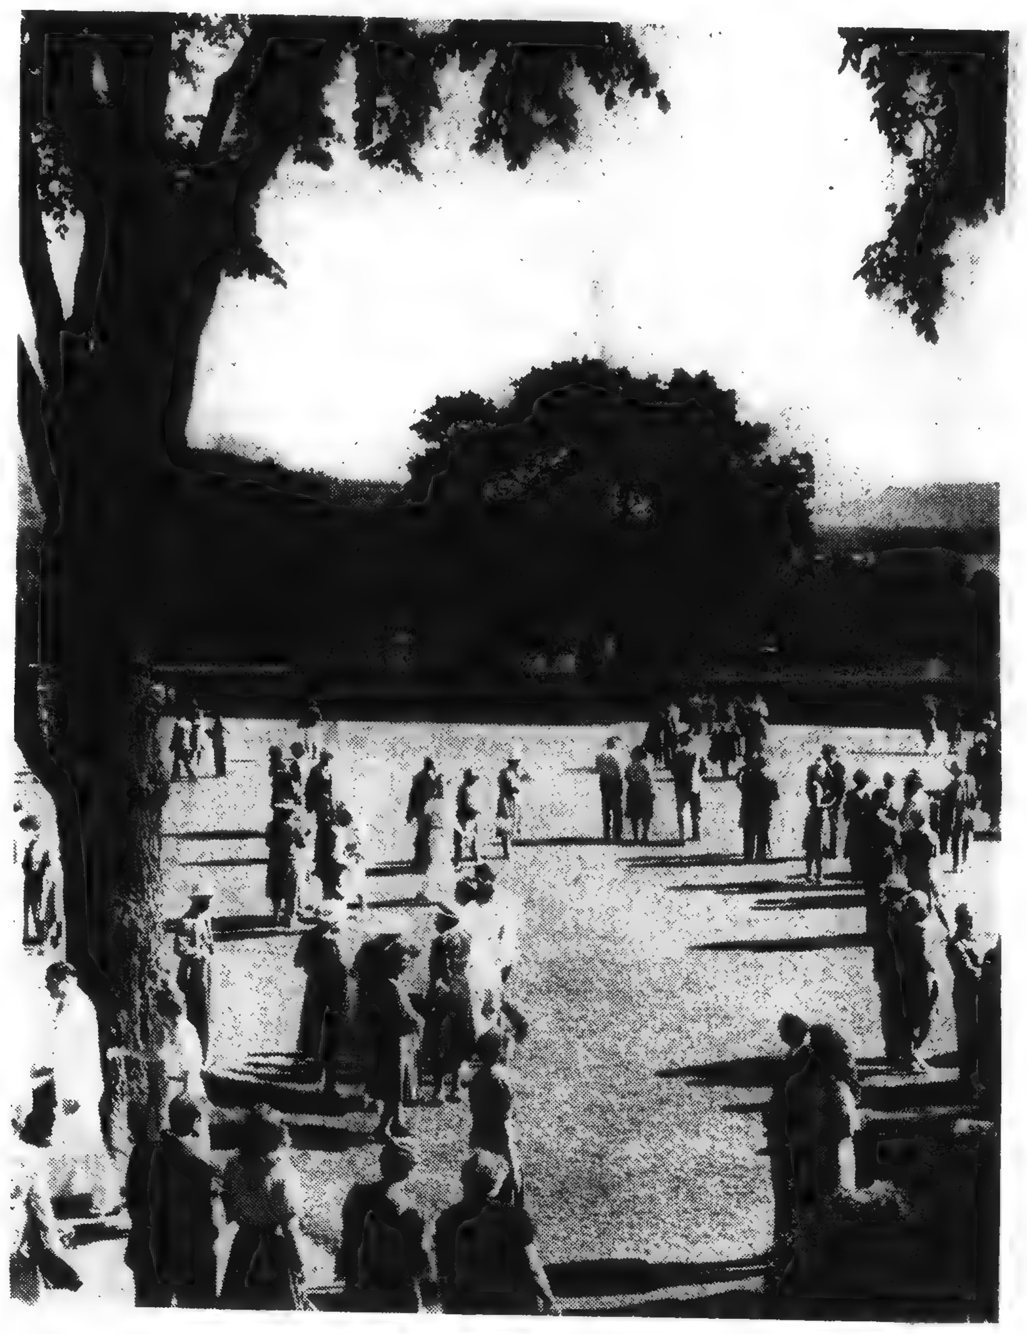
These dimensions may have been found unsatisfactory by the composer himself, if only on purely practical grounds. They required an immense orchestral apparatus, especially in the case of the seventh. The Brobdignagian dimensions of the last two symphonies made them difficult to perform and even to adjust with the requirements of the average orchestral program. For the orchestra of the ninth, excepting a large pulsatile division including gon, cymbals, triangle, large and small drums in addition to tympani, is almost the classic one; the quartet of different wind instruments in pairs, plus piccolo; brass with two trumpets and a tuba; and a fully manned string choir, which brings the instrumental emphasis bac kto nineteenth century levels of sonority after special stress upon wind instruments, in the twentieth.

The interior form of the movements is of a parallel simplicity and concentration. There is a relation to the divisions of the eighth symphony in the fact that the last three parts of the ninth are not separated. Otherwise the succession is again on classic lines—a first movement in sonata form, a second lyrical movement, a third a scherzo, though it does not bear that precise label in the score. The fourth movement serves as introduction to the last, or, if the description is preferred, a brief interlude between the third movement and th efinale in what is essentially a four-movement work.



Egone Camera Artist

Many listeners still prefer to lounge on the grass outside the shed as they used to in the Festival's early days



During intermissions festival-goers stroll about the verdant grounds of Tanglewood midway between Stockbridge and Lenox

MUSIC AGAIN IN THE BERKSHIRE AIR

Symphonic Festival's Big Postwar Season

FOUR HAS always been a significant number of distinguished, choleric conductor Serge Koussevitzky. He was born in 1874, became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, founded the Berkshire Music Center in 1934 and the Berkshire Music School in 1940. His twentieth anniversary in America and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival's tenth both fell in 1944, a year in which even serious music felt the stultifying effects of world conflict. But Sergei Alexandrovitch, as maestro Koussevitzky would be called in his native Russia, and his Berkshire Festival are once more hitting on all cylinders in this Summer of 1946.

The Festival itself, in which the whole Boston Symphony plus a variety of guest soloists (Claudio Arrau and Eugene List, pianists; Carol Brice, contralto; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist; Misha Elman and Erica Morini, violinists) will take part consists of nine concerts spread out over a three-week period.

But these are not, by any means, all. A total of 42 musical performances are scheduled during the course of the Berkshire Music Center's six-weeks term (July 1-August 10). Of these, 16 will be open to the public by paid admission. Twenty-two concert and operatic performances of the Berkshire Music Center and four Coolidge Chamber Concerts are by invitation. But all members of the Society of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center are invited. And this organization is hardly exclusive. A voluntary contribution to the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., makes you a member.

The Festival's opening on July 25 will be made notable by the first performance in America of Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 9, preceded by the first movement from his Symphony No. 6 and followed by Beethoven's Eroica symphony. The second week will be all Brahms and the third, a musical melange ranging from Beethoven to Prokofieff with bits of Wagner and Strauss, Schumann and Tchaikovsky in between.

Dr. Koussevitzky is considered to have the most violent facial mannerisms of any contemporary conductor. His normally serene visage changes from white to red to purple as the show progresses. He mutters and hums to the orchestra. As one unbiased observer expressed it. "You think he'll burst a blood vessel before the second movement." But he hasn't yet.

Paragons for "Park Avenue"

IN ANSWER TO a clarion call from Max Gordon's office for "young, beautiful, well-bred, elegant and exquisite" girls who could sing and dance, we betook ourselves to the Gordonian lair above the Lyceum theatre one recent afternoon. Not, be assured, as an aspirant. Your reporter is male, grizzled and strictly G-I—but if a cat can look at a queen, he can leer at a "mouse."

As it turned out Mr. Gordon was looking for just twelve of these paragons, six singers and six dancers, to embellish his Autumn production, Park Avenue, which, if we are to credit advance reports, promises to be a "beautiful, well-bred, elegant and exquisite" production.

The state of affairs at the Gordon office when we appeared there on the second

CUE, JULY 20, 1946

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM
JUL 21 1946

Berkshire Festival

The Berkshire Festival Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., begin Thursday evening with a program which features the American premiere of Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony. Complete programs for the nine concerts are as follows:

Thursday, July 25, at 8:15—Beethoven's Eroica Symphony; Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 (first time); Moussorgsky-Ravel's Pictures at an Exhibition.

Saturday, July 27, at 8:15—Soloist, Eugene List, pianist—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto; Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe (Second Suite).

Sunday, July 28, at 3:30—Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony; Copland's Appalachian Spring; Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5.

* * *

Thursday, Aug. 1, at 8:15—Soloist, Claudio Arrau, pianist—Brahms' Tragic Overture, Piano Concerto No. 1, and Symphony No. 4.

Saturday, Aug. 3, at 8:15—Soloist, Carol Brice, contralto—Brahms' Symphony No. 3, Rhapsody for Contralto, Male Chorus and Orchestra, and Symphony No. 2.

Sunday, Aug. 4, at 3:30—Soloists, Erica Morini, violinist, and Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist—Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Concerto in A minor for Violin and Cello, and Symphony No. 1.

* * *

Thursday, Aug. 8, at 8:15—Soloist, Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist—Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5; Schumann's Cello Concerto in A minor; Prelude to Wagner's Lohengrin; Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel.

Saturday, Aug. 10, at 8:15—Soloist, Mischa Elman, violinist—Schuman's American Festival Overture; Martinu's Violin Concerto; Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9; Tchaikowsky's Francesca da Rimini.

Sunday, Aug. 11, at 3:30—Thompson's Testament of Freedom for Men's Voices & Orchestra; Beethoven's Symphony

---

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN
JUL 21 1946

Berkshire Musical Festival To Air Three Programs

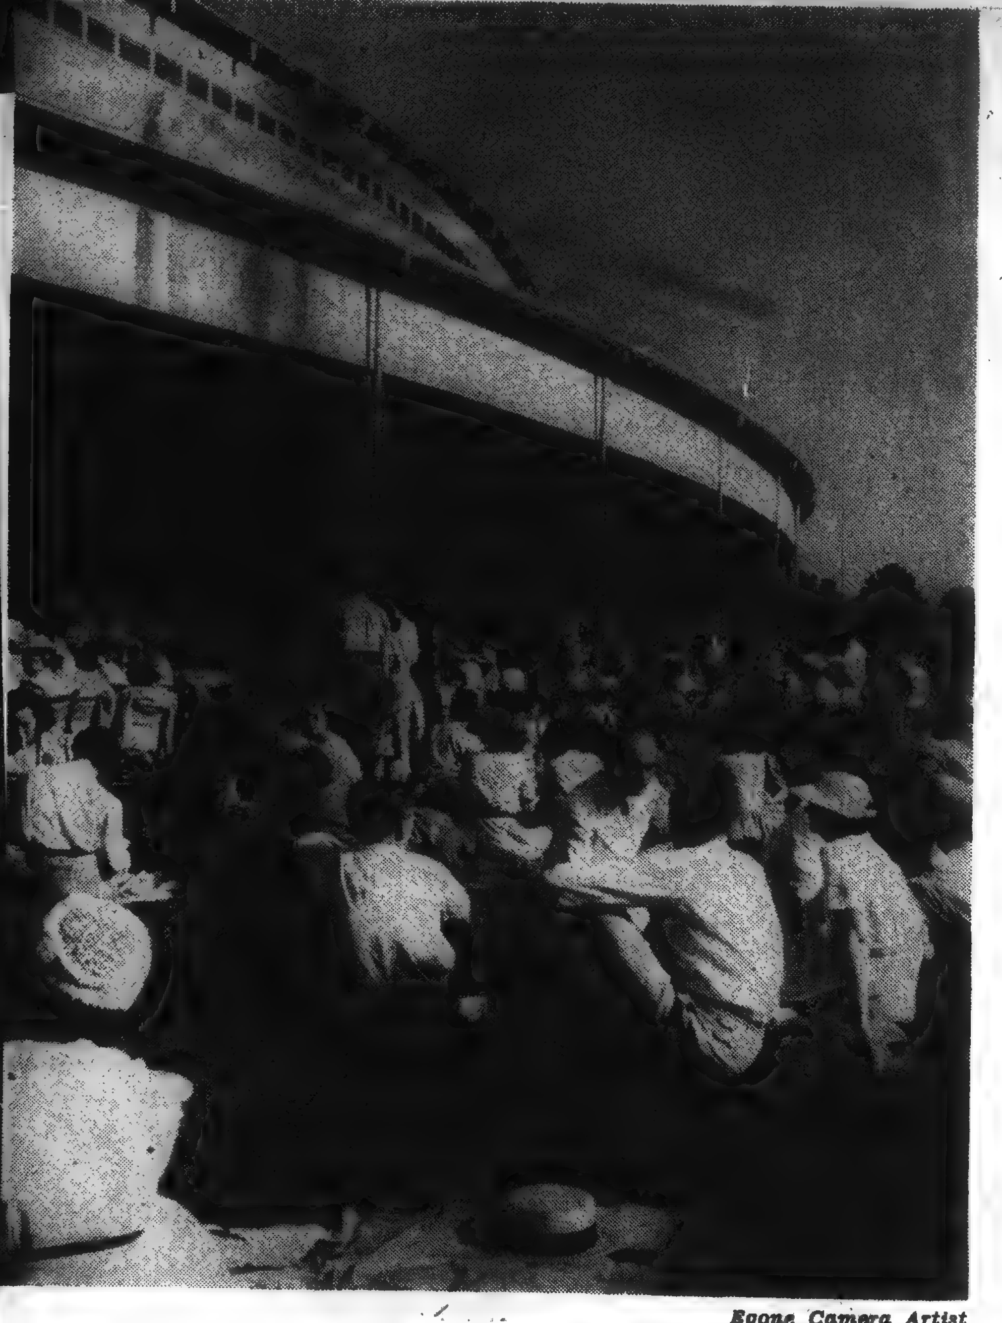
The first three festival broadcasts of the Berkshire Music Festival to be presented over WTJS-ABC, will be heard on Saturday, July 27, at 7:30 to 8:30 p. m., when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returns to the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For the first time since the season closed last spring Dr. Koussevitzky will have his complete orchestra before him.

Two previous broadcasts from the Berkshire Music Festival have been devoted to programs of Bach and Mozart and the Boston leader reduced his ensemble to one comparable to the times when these scores were created.

For the initial festival broadcast Dr. Koussevitzky has selected Eugene List, young American pianist, as soloist. He will be heard in the familiar Second Piano Concerto by Rachmanioff.

Another number to be heard is the Second Daphnis et Chloe Suite by Raval, with which Dr. Koussevitzky will close the broadcast.

The following Saturday evening, Carol Brice, young American contralto, will be soloist and on August 10, when the final broadcast of the festival and of the current season by the Boston Symphony is heard, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 will have its American premiere.



Egone Camera Artist

Many listeners still prefer to lounge on the grass outside the shed as they used to in the Festival's early days

During intermissions festival-goers stroll about the verdant grounds of Tanglewood midway between Stockbridge and Lenox

MUSIC AGAIN IN THE BERKSHIRE AIR

Symphonic Festival's Big Postwar Season

FOUR HAS always been a significant number of distinguished, choleric conductor Serge Koussevitzky. He was born in 1874, became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, founded the Berkshire Music Center in 1934 and the Berkshire Music School in 1940. His twentieth anniversary in America and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival's tenth both fell in 1944, a year in which even serious music felt the stultifying effects of world conflict. But Sergei Alexandrovitch, as maestro Koussevitzky would be called in his native Russia, and his Berkshire Festival are once more hitting on all cylinders in this Summer of 1946.

The Festival itself, in which the whole Boston Symphony plus a variety of guest soloists (Claudio Arrau and Eugene List, pianists; Carol Brice, contralto; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist; Misha Elman and Erica Morini, violinists) will take part consists of nine concerts spread out over a three-week period.

But these are not, by any means, all. A total of 42 musical performances are scheduled during the course of the Berkshire Music Center's six-weeks term (July 1-August 10). Of these, 16 will be open to the public by paid admission. Twenty-two concert and operatic performances of the Berkshire Music Center and four Coolidge Chamber Concerts are by invitation. But all members of the Society of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center are invited. And this organization is hardly exclusive. A voluntary contribution to the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., makes you a member.

The Festival's opening on July 25 will be made notable by the first performance in America of Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 9, preceded by the first movement from his Symphony No. 6 and followed by Beethoven's Eroica symphony. The second week will be all Brahms and the third, a musical melange ranging from Beethoven to Prokofieff with bits of Wagner and Strauss, Schumann and Tchaikovsky in between.

Dr. Koussevitzky is considered to have the most violent facial mannerisms of any contemporary conductor. His normally serene visage changes from white to red to purple as the show progresses. He mutters and hums to the orchestra. As one unbiased observer expressed it. "You think he'll burst a blood vessel before the second movement." But he hasn't yet.

Paragons for "Park Avenue"

IN ANSWER TO a clarion call from Max Gordon's office for "young, beautiful, well-bred, elegant and exquisite" girls who could sing and dance, we betook ourselves to the Gordonian lair above the Lyceum theatre one recent afternoon. Not, be assured, as an aspirant. Your reporter is male, grizzled and strictly G-I—but if a cat can look at a queen, he can leer at a "mouse."

As it turned out Mr. Gordon was looking for just twelve of these paragons, six singers and six dancers, to embellish his Autumn production, Park Avenue, which, if we are to credit advance reports, promises to be [illegible] beautiful, well-bred, elegant and [illegible]ion.

The [illegible]te of affairs at the Gordon office when [illegible]peared there on the second

CUE, JULY 20, 1946

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

JUL 21 1946

Berkshire Musical Festival To Air Three Programs

The first three festival broadcasts of the Berkshire Music Festival to be presented over WTJS-ABC, will be heard on Saturday, July 27, at 7:30 to 8:30 p. m., when Dr. Se[illegible]ky returns to the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For the first time since the season closed last spring Dr. Koussevitzky will have his complete orchestra before him.

Two previous broadcasts from the Berkshire Music Festival have been devoted to programs of Bach and Mozart and the Boston leader reduced his ensemble to one comparable to the times when these scores were created.

For the initial festival broadcast Dr. Koussevitzky has selected Eugene List, young American pianist, as soloist. He will be heard in the familiar Second Piano Concerto by Rachmaninoff.

Another number to be heard is the Second Daphnis et Chloe Suite by Raval, with which Dr. Koussevitzky will close the broadcast.

The following Saturday evening, Carol Brice, young American contralto, will be soloist and on Augus 10, when the final broadcast of th festival and of th current seaso by the Boston Symphony is hear Shostakovich's Symphony No. will have its American premiere

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

JUL 21 1946

Berkshire Festival

The Berkshire Festival Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serg K[illegible], in the Music She at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., begin Thursday evening with a program which features the America premiere of Shostakovich's Nint Symphony. Complete programs fo the nine concerts are as follows:

Thursday, July 25, at 8:15—Beethoven's Eroica Symphony; Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 (first time); Moussorgsky-Ravel's Pictures at an Exhibition.

Saturday, July 27, at 8:15—Soloist, Eugene List, pianist—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto; Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe (Second Suite).

Sunday, July 28, at 3:30—Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony; Copland's Appalachian Spring; Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5.

* * *

Thursday, Aug. 1, at 8:15—Soloist, Claudio Arrau, pianist—Brahms' Tragic Overture, Piano Concerto No. 1, and Symphony No. 4.

Saturday, Aug. 3, at 8:15—Soloist, Carol Brice, contralto—Brahms' Symphony No. 3, Rhapsody for Contralto, Male Chorus and Orchestra, and Symphony No. 2.

Sunday, Aug. 4, at 3:30—Soloists, Erica Morini, violinist, and Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist—Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Concerto in A minor for Violin and Cello, and Symphony No. 1.

* * *

Thursday, Aug. 8, at 8:15—Soloist, Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist—Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5; Schumann's Cello Concerto in A minor; Prelude to Wagner's Lohengrin; Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel.

Saturday, Aug. 10, at 8:15—Soloist, Mischa Elman, violinist—Schuman's American Festival Overture; Martinu's Violin Concerto; Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9; Tchaikowsky's Francesca da Rimini.

Sunday, Aug. 11, at 3:30—Thompson's [illegible]tament of Freedom for Men's Voices & Orchestra; Beethoven's Symphony

◀ From his terrace at Lenox, Mass., Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor, looks out over the opulent Berkshire Hills that he turned into the Summer music capital of the United States

▼ Below, Dr. Koussevitzky directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the music shed at Tanglewood, built in 1938, after the estate became the permanent property of the Berkshire Music Center

---

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

JUL 21 1946

Berkshire Musical Festival To Air Three Programs

The first three festival broadcasts of the Berkshire Music Festival to be presented over WTJS-ABC, will be heard on Saturday, July 27, at 7:30 to 8:30 p. m., when Dr. Se[redacted]ky returns to the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For the first time since the season closed last spring Dr. Koussevitzky will have his complete orchestra before him.

Two previous broadcasts from the Berkshire Music Festival have been devoted to programs of Bach and Mozart and the Boston leader reduced his ensemble to one comparable to the times when these scores were created.

For the initial festival broadcast Dr. Koussevitzky has selected Eugene List, young American pianist, as soloist. He will be heard in the familiar Second Piano Concerto by Rachmaninoff.

Another number to be heard is the Second Daphnis et Chloe Suite by Raval, with which Dr. Koussevitzky will close the broadcast.

The following Saturday evening, Carol Brice, young American contralto, will be soloist and on Augus 10, when the final broadcast of the festival and of th current seaso by the Boston Symphony is hear Shostakovich's Symphony No. will have its American premiere.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

JUL 21 1946

Berkshire Festival

The Berkshire Festival Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serg K[redacted], in the Music She at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., begin Thursday evening with a program which features the America premiere of Shostakovich's Nint Symphony. Complete programs fo the nine concerts are as follows:

Thursday, July 25, at 8:15—Beethoven's Eroica Symphony; Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 (first time); Moussorgsky-Ravel's Pictures at an Exhibition.

Saturday, July 27, at 8:15—Soloist, Eugene List, pianist—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto; Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe (Second Suite).

Sunday, July 28, at 3:30—Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony; Copland's Appalachian Spring; Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5.

* * *

Thursday, Aug. 1, at 8:15—Soloist, Claudio Arrau, pianist—Brahms' Tragic Overture, Piano Concerto No. 1, and Symphony No. 4.

Saturday, Aug. 3, at 8:15—Soloist, Carol Brice, contralto—Brahms' Symphony No. 3, Rhapsody for Contralto, Male Chorus and Orchestra, and Symphony No. 2.

Sunday, Aug. 4, at 3:30—Soloists, Erica Morini, violinist, and Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist—Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Concerto in A minor for Violin and Cello, and Symphony No. 1.

* * *

Thursday, Aug. 8, at 8:15—Soloist, Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist—Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5; Schumann's Cello Concerto in A minor; Prelude to Wagner's Lohengrin; Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel.

Saturday, Aug. 10, at 8:15—Soloist, Mischa Elman, violinist—Schuman's American Festival Overture; Martinu's Violin Concerto; Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9; Tchaikowsky's Francesca da Rimini.

Sunday, Aug. 11, at 3:30—Thompson's Testament of Freedom for Men's Voices & Orchestra; Beethoven's Symphony

Tanglewood's 'Creative Summer in Music'

Boston Sunday Globe
PICTORIAL
JULY 21, 1946

TANGLEWOOD 1½ MI.
PERMANENT HOME
BERKSHIRE
SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL

RICHARD BURGIN conducting a rehearsal of one of the two student orchestras on the stage of the big Music Shed at "Tanglewood." Here, the Berkshire Festival will begin Thursday.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY listens as student conductors rehearse orchestra.

By CYRUS DURGIN
Globe Drama and Music Critic

"TANGLEWOOD," the beautiful estate straddling the town line between Lenox and Stockbridge in the Berkshire Hills, is a place of intense activity these days. The first full-size Berkshire Symphonic Festival since 1941 will begin next Thursday. Serge Koussevitzky's Berkshire Music Center, a school which the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra founded in 1940, has resumed after a wartime lapse of three years. There are 400 students, about 25 percent of them former G.I.'s. They are there, as Mr. Koussevitzky said, "to spend a creative Summer in music," learning from a faculty that includes some world-famous names. The atmosphere is a combination of art, education and rustic simplicity.

REMODELED COWBARN is scene of chamber music rehearsal. Left to Right—Mrs. Marie Clark, Rita Baker, instructor Georges Laurent, Irvin Redcay and Rita Katchen.

LUNCHEON is served from a school bus remodeled into a mobile cafeteria and backed up to a platform with ramps.

CONDUCTING CLASS — Ashley Miller, conducting student, directs imaginary orchestra while instructor Stanley Chapple plays the piano and Harry John Brown looks on.

BLUEPRINT CONFERENCE—Members of the opera workshop go over designs for scenery. Left to Right—Margot Loebl, Mark Sandrich Jr., Claire Rosenstein, instructor Richard Rychtarik, Sylvia Pfeiffer and Kathy Sanger.

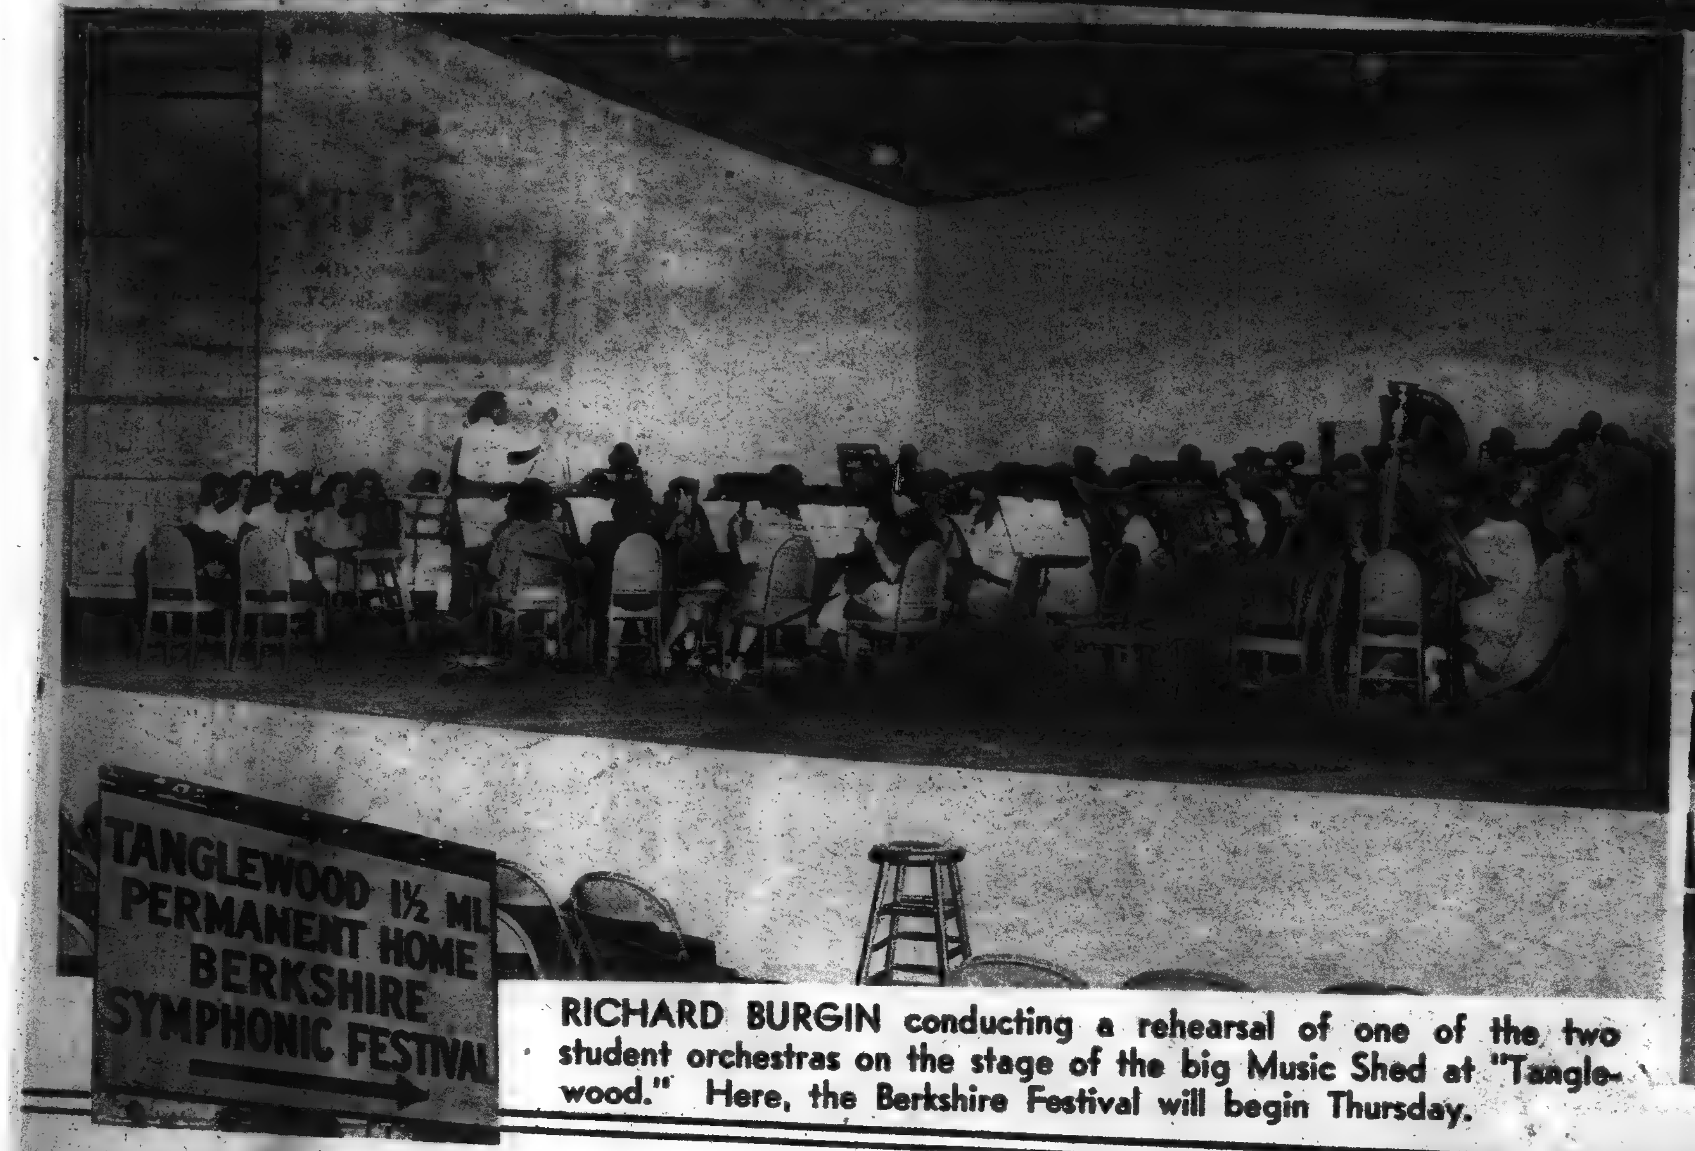
AVENUE OF PINES—The sun slants downward between these "primeval" pines as a group of Music Center people walk to classes.

BORIS GOLDOVSKY (left), head of the opera department, watches Eunice Alberts and Virginia Cole being directed in an acting rehearsal by Leonard Treash.

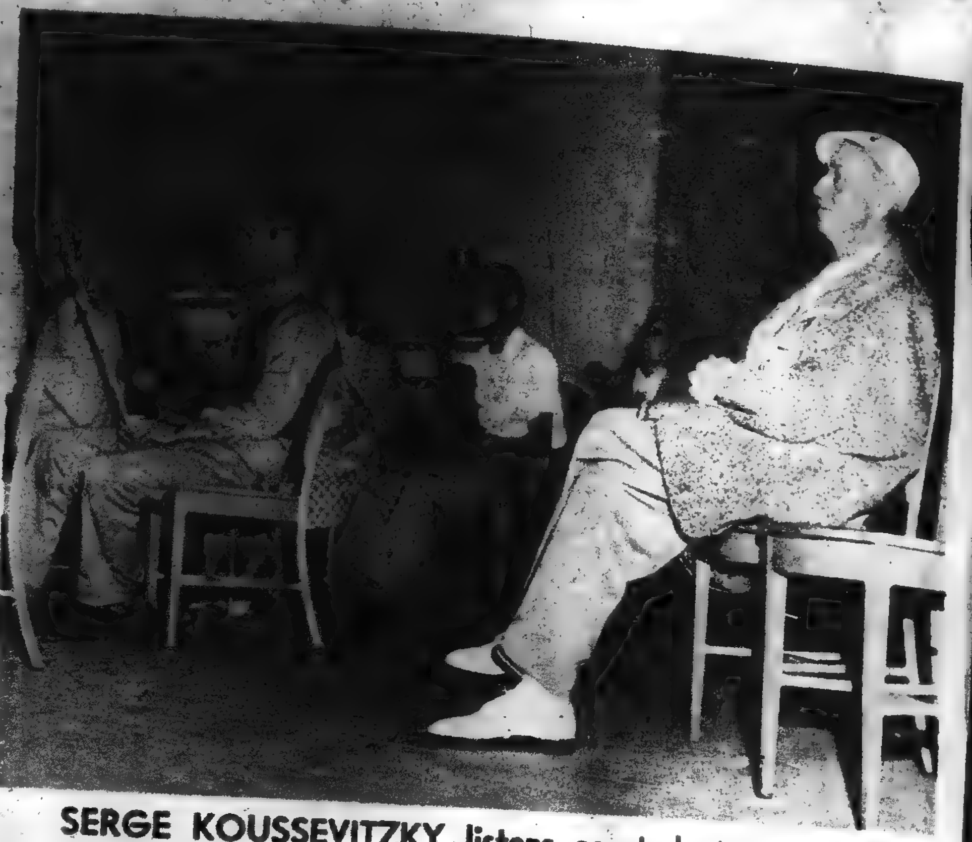
GLOBE STAFF PHOTOS, CHARLES F. McCORMICK

Tanglewood's 'Creative Summer in Music'

Boston Sunday Globe
PICTORIAL
JULY 21, 1946



RICHARD BURGIN conducting a rehearsal of one of the two student orchestras on the stage of the big Music Shed at "Tanglewood." Here, the Berkshire Festival will begin Thursday.

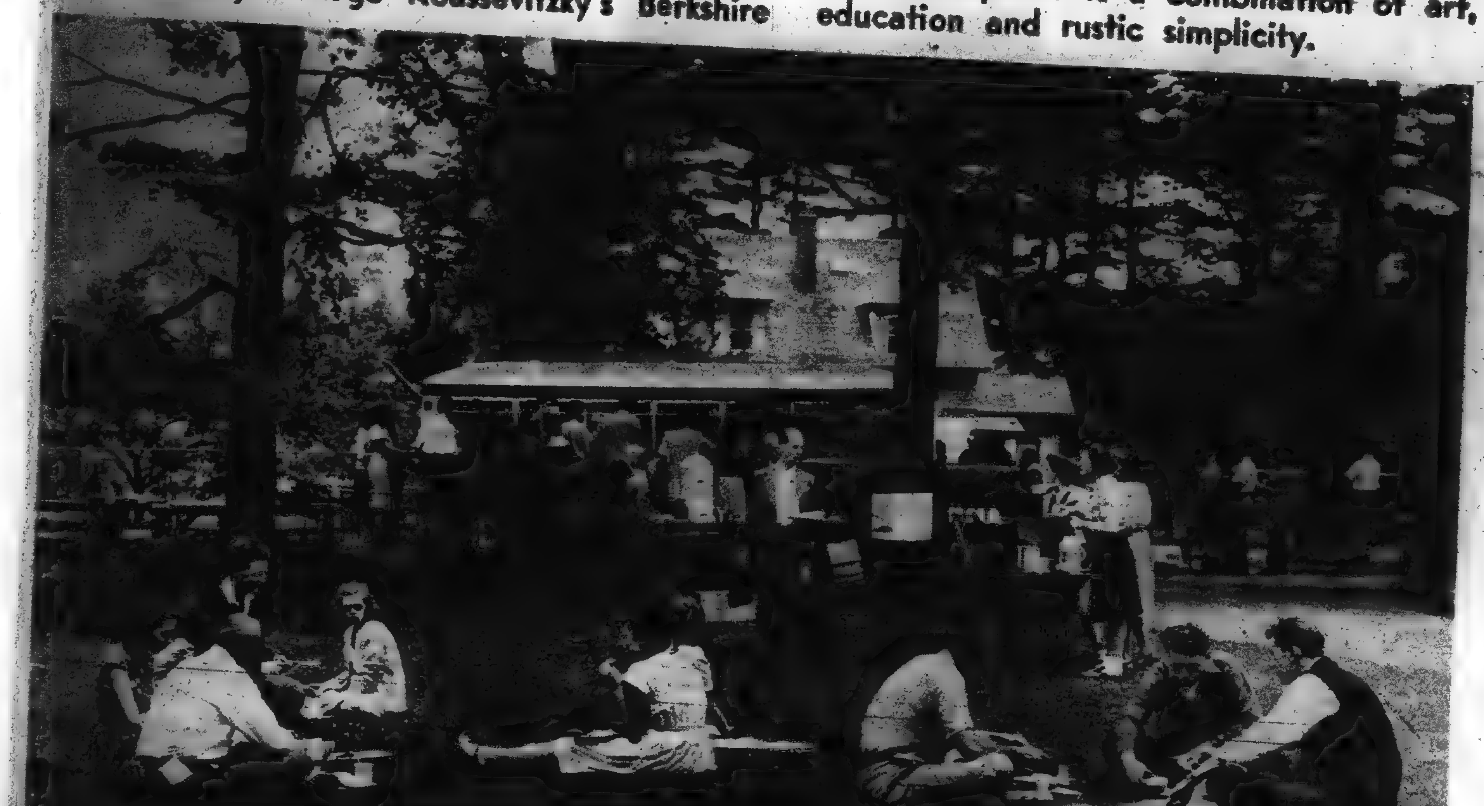


SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY listens as student conductors rehearse orchestra.

By CYRUS DURGIN
Globe Drama and Music Critic

"TANGLEWOOD," the beautiful estate straddling the town line between Lenox and Stockbridge in the Berkshire Hills, is a place of intense activity these days. The first full-size Berkshire Symphonic Festival since 1941 will begin next Thursday. Serge Koussevitzky's Berkshire Music Center, a school which the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra founded in 1940, has resumed after a wartime lapse of three years. There are 400 students, about 25 percent of them former G.I.'s. They are there, as Mr. Koussevitzky said, "to spend a creative Summer in music," learning from a faculty that includes some world-famous names. The atmosphere is a combination of art, education and rustic simplicity.

REMODELED COWBARN is scene of chamber music rehearsal. Left to Right—Mrs. Marie Clark, Rita Baker, instructor Georges Laurent, Irvin Redcay and Rita Katchen.



LUNCHEON is served from a school bus remodeled into a mobile cafeteria and backed up to a platform with ramps.

CONDUCTING CLASS — Ashley Miller, conducting student, directs imaginary orchestra while instructor Stanley Chapple plays the piano and Harry John Brown looks on.

BLUEPRINT CONFERENCE—Members of the opera workshop go over designs for scenery. Left to Right—Margot Loebl, Mark Sandrich Jr., Claire Rosenstein, instructor Richard Rychtarik, Sylvia Pfeiffer and Kathy Sanger.

AVENUE OF PINES—The sun slants downward between these "primeval" pines as a group of Music Center people walk to classes.

BORIS GOLDOVSKY (left), head of the opera department, watches Eunice Alberts and Virginia Cole being directed in an acting rehearsal by Leonard Treash.

GLOBE STAFF PHOTOS, CHARLES F. McCORMICK

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 21 1946

400 Attending Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood

Scenes at Berkshire Music Center, Lenox, Mass., where 400 students and forty-one veteran musicians are passing six weeks of musical study under Serge Koussevitzky. Above, right: Koussevitzky "conducting" a student conductor, Seymour Lipkin. Above, right: A bass player practicing under tree near music center headquarters. Below: Trombonist and violinist practice on back lawn, oblivious of baseball game in progress a few feet away

Ruth Orkin

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and 41 Other Instructors Teach 6-Weeks' Course

Special to the Herald Tribune

LENOX, Mass., July 20.—Muted strings waft across the Berkshire hills again, and star-eyed neophytes in the great romance of music trade enthusiasm for learning again in the reopening of the annual Berkshire Music Center, at near-by Tanglewood. Closed during the war years, this young laboratory for musicians is in progress again and now is in the midst of its six weeks of intensive "living and working with music."

Four hundred students are enrolled, living and working with forty-one distinguished instructors headed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

They come from thirty-three states, Central and South America. Some have studied music without interruption for years; some took recesses from sharps and flats because of service in the armed forces.

Among those enrolled are sixteen student composers, many student conductors, and four whilom conductors who have been selected to study personally under Dr. Koussevitzky. Two student orchestras have been assembled, and two choruses, and several chamber music ensembles.

This laboratory for music fulfills an old dream of Dr. Koussevitzky's: a center of the arts where students could supplement their technical training by association with recognized artists, could transform drab classrooms into a world of music-making. This dream approached reality in 1938 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra acquired the two hundred Tanglewood acres.

The Music Center was established under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction in the summer of 1940. He then termed it a place for "living and working with music." He described it as a temporary home for those seeking the best in music and related arts, for those desiring to refresh mind and personality through contact with the respected in art and culture, and for those equipped to enjoy a creative rest in summer.

The schedule for this summer requires classes six days a week, attendance at forty-four concerts, innumerable forums and lectures. During the last three weeks, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the annual Berkshire Music Festival.

Most of the students are quartered here, a mile and a half from Tanglewood. Many are in quarters provided by the Center; others are billeted in private homes. Sleeping on cots in the school barn are a married couple. Many hitch-hike to classes.

Although the schedule is crowded, informality is a characteristic of the Center. Students practice in off-periods wherever their inclinations lead, being restricted only by the limitations of their instruments—in the Shed, the Main House, the Barn, the Garage, the Theater-Concert Hall, the Chamber-Music Hall, studies, and from non-committal bushes and trees. At the lunch wagon for meals, students and instructors jostle one another. With their trays some sit at picnic tables, others stretch on the lawns.

The program at the Center this summer calls for nine Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony, four Bach-Mozart concerts with the Boston Symphony Players, four chamber-music concerts featuring the Boston Symphony Players and visiting artists, and twenty-two performances by students of the Music Center. The latter will emphasize a tenet of the center—collectve performance, in orchestral, choral and operatic endeavor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 21 1946

Tenth Festival In Berkshires Opens July 25

Koussevitzky to Conduct Boston Symphony in Tanglewood Music Shed

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will open the tenth Berkshire Festival next Thursday night, July 25, at 8:15 in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The programs of the nine concerts are:

Thursday evening, July 25: Largo from Symphony No. 6 and Symphony No. 9 (first performance in America), Shostakovitch; Symphony No. 3 (Eroica), Beethoven.

Saturday evening, July 27: Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral), Beethoven; Piano Concerto No. 2, in C minor, Rachmaninoff (soloist, Eugene List); "Daphnis et Chloe," Suite No. 2, Ravel.

Sunday afternoon, July 29, 3:30: Symphony No. 4 (Italian), Mendelssohn; Suite from "Appalachian Spring," Copland; Symphony No. 2, in C major, Schumann.

Thursday evening, Aug. 1: Brahms program: Tragic Overture, Piano Concerto No. 1, in D minor (soloist, Claudio Arrau), Symphony No. 4.

Saturday evening, Aug. 2: Brahms program: Symphony No. 3, Rhapsody for contralto and male chorus (soloist, Carol Brice); Symphony No. 2.

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 4: Brahms program: Haydn Variations; Double Concerto for violin and cello (soloists, Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky), Symphony No. 1.

Thursday evening, Aug. 8: Symphony No. 5, Prokofieff; Schumann, cello concerto (soloist, Gregor Piatigorsky); Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Strauss, Till Eulenspiegel.

Saturday evening, Aug. 10: Francesca da Rimini, Tchaikovsky; Symphony No. 9, Shostakovitch; Violin concerto, Martinu (soloist, Mischa Elman).

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 11: Testament of Freedom, for men's voices and orchestra, Thompson; Beethoven, Symphony No. 9.

The complete Boston Symphony is playing in this festival for the first time since 1941. In the 1942 festival Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the Berkshire Music Center's senior orchestra. No large-scale festivals were held in 1943, 1944 and 1945, but Dr. Koussevitzky conducted Bach and Mozart chamber music programs in 1944 and 1945. The last concert of this summer's Bach-Mozart series will be held this afternoon in the Center's theater-concert hall. The program includes Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto and fourth suite, and Mozart's violin concerto in A major (K. 219) with William Kroll as soloist, and "Jupiter" symphony.

Other events scheduled at Tanglewood for this week are a chamber music program this morning, a concert by the Berkshire Chamber Orchestra under Louis Speyer next Tuesday night, with Valentina Vishnevska, soprano, and the Center's soprano chorus; a concert by the Center's orchestra on Friday night, a public rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Saturday morning and a choral concert Saturday afternoon. In Tuesday's program Arthur Lourie's cantata, "Naissance de la Beaute" will have its first American performance, and Malipiero's "Le Sette Allegresse d'Amore," for soprano and fourteen instruments, will have its American premiere.

Information about tickets and other details is obtainable from the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. (telephone, Lenox 530). Times mentioned are daylight saving time.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 21 1946

RUSSIAN SYMPHONY PREMIERE

By OLIN DOWNES

THE two most important symphonies that have come from Russia—that country which has been the most productive of music of all the great nations engaged in the war—figure on the programs of the coming weeks of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. One of these is Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, introduced here last season by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. The other is Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony, which will be given its American première by the same forces next Thursday evening at Stockbridge.

This Ninth Symphony, in its very modest proportions, implies an important change in Shostakovich's creative procedure. It is a work of approximately twenty-five minutes in length, in contradistinction to his earlier works in the form, which became longer with each essay up to the Eighth.

These dimensions may have been found unsatisfactory by the composer himself, if only on purely practical grounds. They required an immense orchestral apparatus, especially in the case of the Seventh. The Brobdignagian dimensions of the last two symphonies made them difficult to perform and even to adjust with the requirements of the average orchestral program. The Ninth Symphony is almost a volte-face from the dimensions of the Seventh and Eighth and the orchestral apparatus involved. For the orchestra of the Ninth, excepting a large pulsatile division including gong, cymbals, triangle, large and small drums in addition to tympani, is almost the classic one: the quartet of different wind instruments in pairs, plus piccolo; brass with two trumpets and a tuba; and a fully manned string choir, which brings the instrumental emphasis back to nineteenth-century levels of sonority after special stress upon wind instruments, in the twentieth.

Simplicity of Form

The interior form of the movements is of a parallel simplicity and concentration. There is a relation to the divisions of the Eighth symphony in the fact that the last three parts of the Ninth are not separated. Otherwise the succession is again on classic lines—a first movement in sonata form, a second lyrical movement, a third a scherzo, though it does not bear that precise label in the score. The fourth movement serves as introduction to the last, or, if the description is preferred, a brief interlude between the third movement and the finale in what is essentially a four-movement work. This interlude is in the style of a free dialogue between the low brass instruments, with a broad, strongly rhythmed phrase and free cadenzas of the bassoon (an instrument Shostakovich has often used with special effect) over a background harmony held by the basses and 'celli. The finale is gay, exultant, uproarious, and it is principally in this movement that the power of the orchestra is fully employed.

Soprano Soloist

Lily Pons, who sings at the Lewisohn Stadium Thursday.

Shostakovich completed this symphony in a month's time at the composers' farm near Ivanovo, last August. He first sketched the main ideas of the work, away from the piano. He then wrote out the symphony page by page as it stands today in orchestral score. The printed page makes it clear that he writes with the simplicity of complete technical knowledge and with the logic of a workman who is master equally of his ideas and his means.

Daniel Zhitomirsky, who lived close to the composer when he was writing this symphony and who heard it played piano four hands in advance of the orchestral performance, avers that, despite exterior departures from precedent, Shostakovich's creative method is here wholly consistent with the general line of his development. Speaking interpretively, he finds in the opening movement a Haydnesque simplicity "with a fair share of slyness and subtle irony"; in the second movement "the world of bright and romantic lyricism"; in the third a "precipitate" scherzo movement which evolves from the embryo of the opening measures, and in the finale music which "abounds with brilliant comedy touches."

He continues, in the Soviet Musical Bulletin of last September: "The world of light comedy with a touch of parody and grotesqueness has always been something innately favored by Shostakovich. * * * But the growth of Shostakovich's individuality and its development have shown that the Mephisto side of his nature is indissolubly connected with the Faust one."

Distinguishing Values

Be this as it may, it has not been primarily the parodistic element in which the youthful Prokofieff had long anticipated Shostakovich which has constituted the distinguishing value of the latter's music. It is Shostakovich in the lyrical vein, and Shostakovich, the composer exceptionally capable, in his big moments, of drawing the grand line and the emotional curve, who has most impressed us.

The romanticism of his First symphony, written when he was nineteen; the slow movement of his Fifth; the haunting vistas of beauty interspersed with the bravuras of the Seventh and Eighth, are manifestations of an immense gift, as yet of unpredictable potentialities. For the passages just mentioned too often stand out from neighboring pages of mixed derivations and inconsistencies of style. Now the music is of a noble flight and dramatic power, and now of a banality which caused perhaps by the endeavor to strike the popular, mass note, is incongruous. In places there is almost the effect of a split creative personality.

This latest symphony of Shostakovich, by the printed document, appears to have as its special objective concision, concentration, non-superfluity. It will command attention, as one of the latest expressions of a singularly gifted artist, still a problem child of his nation and his epoch, who, having reached the fortieth year of his growth, presents, to a world that will listen, his Ninth Symphony.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 21 1946

Tanglewood Becomes Music Capital Thursday

First American Performance of Shostakovitch Ninth Symphony Gives Added Significance to Program Drawn Up for Berkshire Festival

By VICTOR PRAHL

The first series of Berkshire festival concerts by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood on Thursday night of this week will mark the opening of what is undoubtedly the most important summer music festival anywhere. For with Salzburg not functioning in its full capacity, surely no other music center can rival the magnificent setting of Tanglewood, its three weekends of nine concerts by the orchestra with chorus and soloists, the Bach-Mozart concerts and chamber series, in conjunction with the music center, already functioning successfully in its fourth season, consisting of two large student orchestras, choruses, chamber groups, various classes, an opera workshop, and a full-length opera especially commissioned for the festival in preparation. With the improved parking space, the enlarged box office and numerous other improvements, the grounds are ready to receive the audience which will probably be the largest in the history of the festival.

The Brahms cycle, the second of the series which will include the master's four symphonies as well as other of his major symphonic works, seems to hold the greatest attraction for subscribers, but the first series has taken on an added significance since the announcement that the opening concert would include the first American performance of the new Shostakovitch "Symphony No. 9."

In New Style

Arriving with considerable less fanfare than his previous symphony for which the New York Philharmonic paid $10,000 to play first, and which has been heard rarely since then, we are told that this is a "scherzo" symphony in one of the composer's new styles, evolved after a rediscovery of the symphonies by Haydn. Taking but 25 minutes to play, all five movements are gay with the exception of the fourth, which is a "largo." This bit of news is reassuring for we find the composer easier to take in his lighter moods than in his attempts at sustained lyricism where his lack of inspiration and even originality are apt to result in outright boredom. Other high lights of the opening week will be Eugene List's performance of the second Rachmaninoff piano concerto on Saturday night and Aaron Copland's successful "Appalachian Spring" suite on Sunday afternoon.

The printed program of the current Bach-Mozart concerts contains Dr Koussevitzky's fine speech of greeting to the students, delivered on the opening day of the school, from which I am taking the liberty of quoting the final paragraphs:—

"Today, in a period of an unprecedented crisis in history, when men find no common contact and means of understanding each other, when all notions and values have lost their former significance, music is an element of unity among men.

"More than any other art, music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers, and speaks a language accessible to all. On the remotest spots of the earth, people experience the same deep emotion when listening to immortal pages written in the universal language of sound. In the light of music, the soul beholds the good and the beautiful; the heart awakens to faith in man and in his better future. If you deprive men of music—just as they were deprived of honor, dignity, human rights, conscience, faith and freedom—you will witness the decline of the world to a state of brutality and barbarism. Music alone can still tame the beast in man—it is our comfort and hope. Even religion and the churches, having lost their unity, have also lost their moral control and their power over the conscience of men.

"It is our great blessing and deep joy to be serving music at a time when its radiant influence is revealed to the world with such conviction, and when the meaning of music is justifying also the meaning of man's existence."

Revised Festival Programs

The festival programs, somewhat revised since their first announcement, are printed below:—

Berkshire Festival Programs
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

Thursday evening, July 25:—
Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55 .... Beethoven Symphony No. 9 (First performance in America) .... Shostakovitch Pictures at an Exhibition
Moussorgsky-Ravel

Saturday evening, July 27:—
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral" .. Beethoven
Piano concerto No. 2 in C minor, opus 18
Rachmaninoff
Eugene List, Soloist
"Daphnis et Chloe," ballet (Second suite)
Ravel

Sunday afternoon, July 28:—
Symphony No. 4 in A major, "Italian" Mendelssohn
Suite from "Appalachian Spring" . Copland
Symphony No. 5, in E minor .. Tchaikovsky

Brahms Week

Thursday evening, August 1:—
Tragic overture, opus 81
Piano concerto No. 1, in D minor
Claudio Arrau, Soloist
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, opus 98
Saturday evening, August 3:—
Symphony No. 3 in F major, opus 90
Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, opus 53
Carol Brice, Soloist
Symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 73
Sunday afternoon, August 4:—
Variations on a theme by Haydn, opus 56a
Concerto in A minor for violin and violoncello, opus 102
Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky, Soloists
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, opus 68
Thursday evening, August 8:—
Symphony No. 5, opus 100 ..... Prokofieff
Violoncello concerto in A minor, opus 129
Schumann
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," rondo
Strauss
Gregor Piatigorsky, Soloist
Saturday evening, August 10:—
American festival overture .... Schuman
Concerto for violin .... Martinu
Mischa Elman, Soloist
Symphony No. 9 .... Shostakovitch
"Francesca da Rimini" ...... Tchaikovsky
Sunday afternoon, August 11:—
"The Testament of Freedom," for men's voices with orchestra ...... Thompson Symphony No. 9 in D minor, opus 125
Beethoven
Festival Chorus—Soloists to be announced.

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS
JUL 2 1 1946

Days Crowded At Tanglewood; Daytonian Tells Of Festival

BY BETTY A. DIETZ
Daily News Music Editor

FROM the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood—Conductor Koussevitzky's baby—an envelope gaudy with purple and orange stamps brings a picture of busyness and music making made even more pleasant by drifting breezes and heavy shade trees. Eleanor McCann, director of music for the Dayton Art Institute, promised to write of some of the activities and write she did, practically by the light of the moon, so busy are her days.

Tanglewood, according to Miss McCann, is an exciting place, bustling with musicians burdened with instruments and scores and just plain music lovers holding tightly to programs, on which they've managed to capture the scrawls meant to identify various celebrities.

And celebrities there are—the place is alive by them. The guiding light of the festival, though, is the most important of all. Dr. Koussevitzky, Miss McCann wrote, is everywhere. "Each morning he appears at the rehearsal of orchestra No. 2 (the Boston Symphony orchestra being No. 1) and sits up on the stage, beating time with his foot and singing some theme when one of the young conductors doesn't quite meet his level of perfection with the orchestra. And he appears at every student performance whether it be madrigal or chamber music or discussions."

Leonard Bernstein, amazing young conductor-pianist-composer who will conduct the performance of Britten's opera, Peter Grimes, at Tanglewood, arrived from London where he was music director for the Ballet Theater. At rehearsals he heard solo and ensemble parts of Peter Grimes for the first time.

"After an hour of reading through the parts," Miss McCann recalled, "Bernstein told them, 'It's better than my wildest dreams. Needs a hell of a lot of work but it's wonderful.'

"The interesting thing about this work"—Koussevitzky commissioned the young English composer, Benjamin Britten, to write an opera for the current festival —"is that everybody, soloists, chorus, orchestra players, all claim it's the most difficult thing they've ever tried to sing or play but all end with 'it's terrific.'"

Further describing the opera, Miss McCann wrote that "often the orchestra is in one key and the soloist in another, but there is a reason for that. In the opera there are two main oppositions: The ocean fights Peter Grimes and he fights the community in which he lives. You feel this conflict of man set against nature and, of course, you feel it most strongly in the music. Mr. Britten seems to have a gift for showing this contrast between the musical function of man and the musical function of nature. In the end nature destroys Peter—but there are some beautiful moments during the running of the course of this terrific struggle.

"According to the underground telegraph, Mr. Britten is coming over (from England) to put the final touches on the performance himself. Right now two coaches from the Met and Boris Goldosky and Bernstein are hard at work."

Enrolment at the music center this summer is some 200 over that of 1942. And half this number are veterans who are returning to their work in music. Sitting next to Miss McCann in the conducting class, for instance, is a former paratrooper who made 14 jumps, yet found time, too, to conduct an orchestra in London, doing Beethoven's Eighth symphony. Another young musician had been guest conductor with the Nuremburg Philharmonic.

Miss McCann's prize story, however, concerns a carpenter who was putting shelves in the little music shop where she is working a few hours each day. Two practice rooms are over the music shop and Mozart vies daily with Hindemith and sopranos with bassoons. The carpenter, intrigued by the music which drifted down, tried to remember and place the snatches he could hear. When the musicians went through on their way to the street the carpenter button-holed one of the men long enough to learn it was the Beethoven Archduke trio whose name he couldn't remember. With that bit of information he gladly settled back to his work.

Dr. Koussevitzky would have appreciated the incident, I think. In his address at the opening exercises of the Berkshire music center, he said, "Today in a period of an unprecedented crisis in history, when men find no common contact and means of understanding each other, when all notions and values have lost their former significance, music is the element of unity among men. More than any other art, music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers, and speaks a language accessible to all."

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
JUL 21 1946

Tangl

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

MRS. Franklin D. Roosevelt will attend the opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox. With Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., whose guest she will be, she will hear on the evening of July 25 the first performance in America of Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony ~~by the Boston~~ Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

Among the distinguished listeners to the festival concerts on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons from July 25 to Aug. 11 will be Sir Alexander Cadogan, British delegate to the United Nations conference; Commodore James K. Vardaman, formerly President Truman's naval aide recently appointed to the Federal Reserve board; Lady Berendsen of the New Zealand legation in Washington, D. C.; Princess Emina Toussoun of Egypt; Adolf A. Berle, Jr.; recently ambassador to Brazil; Mrs. Joseph P. Kennedy, wife of the former ambassador to the Court of St. James; and Mrs. Myron Taylor, wife of the ambassador to the Vatican.

The wives of two radio commentators, Lowell Thomas and H. V. Kaltenborn, are planning to attend, as are Mrs. Guy P. Gannett, president of the American Federation of Music clubs, and Mrs. Andrew Hepburn, who with her aunt, Miss Mary A. Tappan, gave "Tanglewood," their summer home, to the Boston Orchestra.

The three programs for the week-end of July 25 are as follows:

Thursday evening, July 25, at 8:30 p. m.: Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eronica," Op. 55: Shostakovitch—Symphony No. 9 (first performance in America); Moussorgsky-Ravel — Pictures at an exhibition.

Saturday evening, July 27, at 8:30 p. m.: Beethoven — Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"; Rachmaninoff—Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor, Op. 18; Ravel—"Daphnis et Chole," Ballet (Second Suite); soloist—Eugene List.

Sunday afternoon, July 28, at 3:30 p. m.: Mendelssohn—Symphony No. 4 in A major, "Italian"· Copland—Suite from "Appalachian Spring"; Tchaikovsky —Symphony No. 5, in E minor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUL 21 1946

RECORDS: IN HONOR OF JEFFERSON

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

ONE of the most gifted choral writers in this country, Randall Thompson, tackled a tough job when he undertook to set to music four passages from the writings of Thomas Jefferson. The outcome is The Testament of Freedom (Victor 1054, three twelve-inch records) and it honors the spirit of Jefferson, as it enhances Mr. Thompson's reputation.

Mr. Thompson wrote this setting for male voices and orchestra in 1943 in observance of the two-hundredth anniversary of Jefferson's birth. Himself a member of the University of Virginia faculty, he dedicated the score "To the University of Virginia Glee Club, in Memory of the Father of the University, 1743-1943." The glee club presented the première on April 13, 1943, under Dr. Stephen Tuttle's direction. It was broadcast over a CBS network, recorded by the OWI and sent by short-wave to our armed forces overseas. No doubt it was also heard by some people in the occupied countries and perhaps they drew some small measure of courage from it.

The Harvard Glee Club, directed by G. Wallace Woodworth, added the work to its repertoire. Serge Koussevitzky heard it in Boston and he ~~and the~~ Boston Symphony joined with the Harvard Glee Club in making this effective recording.

Sources for Text

Mr. Thompson drew his text from "A Summary View of the Rights of British America" (1774); "Declaration of Causes and Necessity of Taking Up Arms" (July 6, 1775), and a letter to John Adams (Sept. 12, 1821).

The setting begins and ends with these words, "The God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time; the hand of force may destroy but cannot disjoin them." It goes on to a long passage beginning, "We have counted the cost of this contest and find nothing so dreadful as voluntary slavery," and ending with "being with one mind resolved to die freemen rather than to live slaves." The next section starts with "We fight not for glory or for conquest." And the passage from the letter written in 1821 used by Mr. Thompson deserves to be quoted in full:

"I shall not die without a hope that light and liberty are on steady advance . . . and even should the cloud of barbarism and despotism again obscure the science and liberties of Europe, this country remains to preserve and restore light and liberty to them. . . . The flames kindled on the Fourth of July, 1776, have spread over too much of the globe to be extinguished by the feeble engines of despotism; on the contrary, they will consume those engines and all who work them."

Mr. Thompson has not sought to outdo the eloquence of Jefferson's words. He has underscored them where necessary, but he has composed his setting with admirable dignity and restraint. There will be some who will complain that this music is too genteel and that it should have more blood and thunder. But Jefferson spoke in measured words that were strong without being loud. And there is no point in telling a composer what idiom he should choose. Here is his music; evaluate it as it stands.

It is a polished, craftsmanlike job. Mr. Thompson knows how to bring out the music of the English language and in this score he has found rhythmic grace and power for Jefferson's prose.

Album of Poetry

Another album of memorable words, this time poetry, comes also from Victor with The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam (1055, two twelve-inch records). Ralph Bellamy, currently in the Broadway hit, "State of the Union," is the reader and there is a musical background composed by Henry S. Gerstle and played by the Victor Chamber Orchestra directed by Macklin Marrow. Edward Fitzgerald's classic has been condensed for this recording, but there is enough of it to please all but those who treasure every word of the poem. Mr. Bellamy reads well but the music is obvious and often obtrusive.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
JUL 2 1 1946 10

First Work to Be Presented at Tanglewood

By Albert Goldberg

No one who looks fairly at the voracious public appetite for opera really believes that music drama is a dead art form. But neither opera nor any other art can go on indefinitely without new creative nourishment, and the sad fact is that altho the first decade of the 20th century witnessed the production of such durables as Debussy's "Pelléas and Mélisande," Richard Strauss' "Salome" and "Electra" and Puccini's "Tosca" and "Madame Butterfly," only "Der Rosenkavalier," of the fairly formidable flood of operas written since then has shown the qualities that keep a work regularly in the repertory.

Benjamin Britten

True, there have been Montemezzi's "L'Amore dei Tre Re"—which would have a good chance at survival if its adequate casting were not so difficult—and Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna," as well as such brief sensational flurries as Ravel's "L'Heure Espagnol," Berg's "Wozzeck," Krenek's "Jonny Spielt Auf," Weinberger's "Schwanda the Bagpiper," and Shostakovich's "Lady Macbeth of Mtensk," tho revivals become more and more infrequent.

• • •

Now the eyes of the musical world are focused on England, the most unlikely of all operatic sources, where a young 33 year old composer, Benjamin Britten, last year burst into international fame with his "Peter Grimes," and where his latest opera, "The Rape of Lucretia," last week seems to have won critical acclaim in excess even of his earlier work. Not in the three and a half centuries since Henry Purcell has England produced an opera writer half so successful, tho many English composers—Dame Ethyl Smyth, Gustav Holst and Vaughan Williams among them—have worked assiduously at the task.

Britten has called opera "the most exciting of musical forms." In both his serious works—he also is the author of an operetta based on the American folk hero, Paul Bunyan—he has struck out in his own direction, leaving far behind the sword play and pageantry of Verdi, the mythology of Wagner, the sentimentality of Puccini and the luridness of Strauss.

In the preface to "Peter Grimes"—which will receive its first American performances at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., on Aug. 6, 7, and 9—the composer states his then operatic creed: "I am especially interested in the general architectural and formal problems of opera, and decided to reject the Wagnerian theory of 'permanent melody' for the classical practice of separate numbers that crystallize and hold the emotion of the dramatic situation at chosen moments. One of my chief aims is to try and restore to the musical setting of the English language a brilliance, freedom and vitality that have been curiously rare since the death of Purcell."

• • •

Whereas in the sensationally successful "Peter Grimes"—the composition of which was made possible by a grant from the Koussevitzky Foundation — Britten employed musical forces totaling 200 singers and musicians, his latest opera appears to be equally original in quite another direction for it employs a small cast of singers and an orchestra of only a dozen players. Reviewing its premiere in Glyndebourne on July 12, F. Bonavia wrote in the New York Times:

"Mr. Britten's second opera ['The Rape of Lucretia'] is even more striking, more adventurous, more important than his first. Mr. Britten is a very gifted composer of music who faces the problems of opera with a mind that is not hampered by bias or tradition. He borrows from Greek tragedy the chorus, but he uses the device for his own purpose. Instead of the usual unwieldly massed chorus of opera, he has two singers, one male and one female, who comment on the action and also join in the musical ensemble, adding two more voices to duet or quartet and widening the scope and effect of a dramatic moment.

"The process of reduction, the substitution of the individual for the mass, is carried a step farther in the orchestra, which consists of only a dozen players, but employed with such tact that, far from being aware of lack of power or variety, one is amazed at the range and geniality of the orchestra solo.

"But the most striking feature is the new Britten opera is the widening of range, the deepening of sympathy suggested by music that is at times quite as fierce and robust as anything in 'Grimes,' and also more exquisite and more delicately beautiful than the finest page of the earlier opera."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

JUL 21 1946

New Haveners Plan Tanglewood Trip

Bus Company Sponsors Sunday Excursions; Today's Program Features Bach, Mozart

By H. PHILIP DUDLEY

Tanglewood in the Berkshires has become a major factor in the musical life of this country. The gathering of thousands of people in and around the great Music Shed to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Berkshire Festival concerts is of itself significant. It is the earnest work of more than 400 selected students, most of them less than 30 years of age, however, which cannot help but have a powerful impact upon creative music in America.

The Berkshire Center is indeed living up to the exalted dream of Serge Koussevitsky—a place for "living and working in music—to serve those who seek the best in music and the related arts, who are anxious to refresh mind and personality through contact with the elite in art and culture, and who long for a creative rest in Summer."

You Can Go

Turning to the aspect of Tanglewood which is immediately significant to thousands of music lovers in New England—the opportunity to hear the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Berkshire Festival Concerts, it is encouraging to find it readily available to music lovers in this area. Excursions by motor coach are being offered by the Connecticut Company on three Sunday afternoons—July 28, August 4, and August 11. Leaving New Haven at noon, these buses go directly to Tanglewood, returning after the concerts with a stop at Winsted for supper.

On the afternoon of July 28, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4 in a A major (the "Italian"); Copland's Suite from "Appalachian Spring," and Schumann's Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61.

The program for August 4 will consist entirely of Brahms' works, including "Variations On a Theme by Haydn," Op. 56a; Concerto in A minor for violin and violoncello, Op. 102; and Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68. The soloists for this concert will be Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky.

On August 11, the program will consist of Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom," for men's voices with orchestra, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 in D minor, Op. 125. These works will be presented with the assistance of the Festival Chorus, with soloists to be announced.

Officials of the Connecticut Company have announced that while all reserved seats have been sold out for the first two of these concerts, the management of the Festivals gives absolute assurance that general admission tickets can be obtained by all persons taking these excursion trips.

Other Concerts

For those who may be planning to go to Tanglewood by other means, we mention here some of the forthcoming Tanglewood events on other dates.

This afternoon at 3:30 the second Bach-Mozart program will be given, including Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major, and the Suite (Overture) in D major, No. 4; and Mozart's Violin Concerto in A major, No. 5 (K219), and Symphony ("Jupiter") No. 41 (K551). William Kroll will be the violin soloist.

Festival Concerts will be given at 8:15 on the following evenings:

Thursday, July 25—Shostakovich, Largo from Symphony No. 6; Shostakovich, Symphony No. 9 (first American performance); Beethoven, Symphony No. 3.

Saturday, July 27—Beethoven, Symphony No. 6; Rachmaninoff, piano concerto No. 2 in C minor (Eugene List); Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe," Ballet (Second Suite).

Thursday, August 1 — Brahms: "Tragic Overture"; Piano Concerto in No. 1 in D minor (Claudio Arrau); Symphony No. 4 in E minor.

Saturday, August 3 — Brahms: Symphony No. 3 in F major; Rhapsody for Contralto, Male Chorus, and Orchestra (Carol Brice); Symphony No. 2 in D major.

Thursday, August 8—Prokofieff, Symphony No. 5; Schumann, Violoncello Concerto in A mino (Gregor Piatigorsky); Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Rondo.

All tickets for the series are on sale at Tanglewood; information may be had by addressing the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., or by telephoning Lenox 530.

Two Firsts Scheduled At Tanglewood

One Composition Dedicated to Mrs. Coolidge

Two compositions for chamber orchestra and voice will be performed for the first time in America tomorrow evening at Tanglewood by the Berkshire Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Louis Speyer. One of them, "Le Sette Allegresse d'Amore" (Lorenzo de-Medici), dedicated by Francesco Malipiero to Mrs Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, will be given its world premiere, in the last of four chamber music concerts on successive Tuesday evenings under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress.

The cantata, "Naissance de la Beaute" (Jules Supervielle) by Arthur Lourie, is for soprano soloist, 12 sopranos, clarinet, bassoon, harpsichord and small cymbals. Assisted by Putnam Aldrich at the harpsichord, Miss Valentina Vishnevska, soprano, and the soprano chorus of the Berkshire Music Center, trained by Hugh Ross, nine principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, members of the instrumental faculty of the school, make up the orchestra. They are Richard Burgin and Alfred Kripps, violin; Jean LeFranc, viola; Jean Bedetti, violoncello; Viktor Polatschek, clarinet; Raymond Allard, bassoon; Roman Szulc, timpani; and Lukas Foss, piano.

An extra concert by Department 5 orchestra will be given tonight at 8.15. Bach-Mozart concerts, the choral program at Trinity Church Saturday afternoon and chamber music concert yesterday morning attracted nearly 3500 persons. Audiences are increasing for events at the school, to which all students and Friends of the Berkshire Music Center are invited, as membership in the society increases and more guests arrive for the Berkshire Festival to open Thursday night.

The program follows for tomorrow night's concert:

Sextet for piano, two violins, viola, violoncello and clarinet .... Copland
Allegro vivace—slow—finale.
Naissance de la Beaute .... Lourie
Les Heures
Venus
Le Vent
Les Heures
Le Sette Allegresse d'Amore (Lorenzo de Medici) .... Malipiero
Divertissement for 16 instruments.... Ibert
Introduction—cortege—nocturne—valse—parade—finale

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 21 1946

Italian Royalty to Attend Concerts at Tanglewood

Princess Eugenia Ruspoli, Formerly of Rome, Will Occupy the Imperial Suite at Curtis Hotel

Special Dispatch to The Sunday Union and Republican

BERKSHIRE HILLS, July 20—Princess Eugenia Ruspoli, 610 Park avenue, New York city, formerly of Castello di Nemi, Rome, arrived today at Lenox and will occupy for six weeks the imperial suite at Curtis hotel. She was accompanied by her son-in-law and daughter, Prince and Princess Alexis Droutzkoy.

Will Attend Concerts

They are to attend all the concerts at the Tanglewood Music festival starting Thursday. Princess Ruspoli, widow of Prince Enrico Ruspoli of Italy, is the former Eugenia Berry of Oak Hill, Ga., and she has been an annual visitor at the Curtis for a number of years.

Princess Ruspoli was a passenger on the American Export liner, Vulcania, which berthed Tuesday at New York after a journey from Naples, Genoa, and Palermo. She went to Nemi in May to make an initial inspection since the war of her 134-room castle, which was restored in 1906 at a cost of more than $1,000,000. It was occupied during the recent war by Germans who removed 35 truck loads of furnishings, including paintings and tapestries. Later the castle was sacked by villagers Princess Droutzkoy (Maria Teresa Berry) is a niece as well as an adopted daughter of Princess Ruspoli. Her marriage to Prince Droutzkoy, son of Prince and Princess Alexander I. Droutzkoy of St Petersburg, Russia, took place at St Patrick's cathedral rectory New York, on December 16, 1944. She is the niece of the late Miss Martha McChesney Berry, founder of the famous Berry schools in Georgia.

Tanglewood Boxholders

Hotels, taverns, rooming houses will be filled to capacity in all the Berkshire region for the Tanglewood concerts. There is interest especially among musicians in the American premiere Thursday of Shostakovitch's symphony No. 9.

Every box will be occupied for the nine concerts over three weekends, and the group that has taken them for the entire list is larger than at any previous time. They include Mr and Mrs Archibald McLeish of Conway, Mrs Edward A. Jones of Pittsfield, Mr and Mrs Bruce Crane, Mr and Mrs Walter Hoving, Miss Mabel Choate, Miss Marion M. Kemp, Mrs John Barry Ryan, Mrs Myron C. Taylor, Mr and Mrs John Nicholas Brown, Mr and Mrs William Felton Barrett, Mrs Caroline Davie Lloyd, Mr and Mrs Heaton Ives Treadway, Mrs Ernest B. Dane, Mr and Mrs John Shepard, Jr., Mr and Mrs D. Percy Morgan, Mrs E. Griswold Hollister, Mrs Edwin C. Jameson, Mrs George Otis Rockwood and daughter, Princess Diane R. Eristavi.

Miss Anna Remsen Alexandre, Dr and Mrs Walter W. Palmer, Mr and Mrs Walter C. Cannon, Mrs John S. Newberry, Mr and Mrs Clarence A. Warden, Mrs Norval H. Busey, Jr., Mrs Walter S. Crandall, Mr and Mrs Lester Roberts, Mr and Mrs John S. Williams, Mr and Mrs Harry F. McRell, Mr and Mrs Winthrop M. Crane, Jr., Mr and Mrs Laurence R. Connor, Mrs Leonard Clark Feathers, Mr and Mrs E. Norman Scott, Mr and Mrs John F. Treadway, Mr and Mrs John D. Kennedy, Mrs Donald J. Warner, Miss Edith Scoville, Mrs Ramsey C. Hoguet, Mrs John L. Senior, Gordon Mendelssohn and E. J. Glynn of Willimansett.

Among purchasers of boxes for the first series only are E. V. Johnson of Springfield, Mr and Mrs Robert K. Wheeler of Great Barrington, Philip and Mrs Philip Marshall Brown of South Williamstown, Mr and Mrs Carey R. Kinney, Pittsfield; Mr and Mrs David T. Dana and Miss Ellen Bullard, Mr and Mrs Charles A. Cass, Mr and Mrs Henry B. Sawyer, Boston, who are to be at Curtis hotel; Mr and Mrs Chauncey D. Stillman, Mrs William Mather Lewis.

Hepburns to Be at Lenox

Mr and Mrs Andrew Hopewell Hepburn of Concord are arriving Wednesday at the Lenox club, Lenox, for the Music festival. Mrs Hepburn is the former Rosamond Sturgis Dixey who, with her aunt, the late Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan, in 1937 gave Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mr and Mrs James Dwight Francis of Santa Barbara, Cal., formerly of Pittsfield, are to be at the Lenox club for the festival. Also coming are Mr and Mrs Edward A. Taft of Walnut street, Boston; Mr and Mrs Thomas N. Metcalf of Beaver place, Boston, Mr and Mrs E. Norman Scott, Stockbridge, were dinner hosts at the Lenox club early in the week.

Mrs Caroline Davie Lloyd was a luncheon hostess at Fencefields at Lee, where Queen Wilhelmina of the Netherlands spent a part of the summer of 1942. Mrs Lloyd's guests were Dr and Mrs J. Duncan Spaeth, Rev Edmund Randolph Laine, Mr and Mrs Osman Pederson, Miss Virginia Field and Mrs William Penn Cresson, Dr Spaeth who, with Mrs Spaeth, is a house guest of Mrs Lloyd, is retired Murray professor of English literature at Princeton university.

Mr and Mrs Adolf A. Berle, Jr., entertained at a picnic at Konkapot, Great Barrington, a group of South American students who are attending the Tanglewood summer music school. The hosts returned recently from Rio de Janeiro where Dr Berle was American embassador.

At Berkshire Inn

Mr and Mrs Lowell Thomas are to be at Berkshire inn, Great Barrington, for the Tanglewood festival and while there Mr Thomas will select a name for the new pine-sheathed grill.

Tomorrow Mr and Mrs Edward J. Larkin, Great Barrington, are to celebrate their 25th wedding anniversary with a reception at the Berkshire inn. Noticed in a dinner party at the inn were Rev Jeremiah McCarthy, Rev Bernard Kerringan and Dr Thomas Shea.

Among those at the inn the past week were Mr and Mrs Horace E. Thorn of Elkins Park, Philadelphia; Mr and Mrs John G. O'Connor, Springfield; Misses Doris Peterson and Margaret M. Kennedy, Holyoke; Mr and Mrs Quincy Ward Boese, 1010 Fifth avenue, New York, who are staying until September.

Mrs Hallie Flanagan Davis, dean of Smith college and head of the drama department, was a guest at the Rollins Dramatic school, Lenox, last night for the first play, "Hannele On Journey." This was the American premiere. After the play Mr and Mrs Leighton Rollins, directors of the theater, gave a supper party at their summer home, The Orchard, for the staff and senior students.

MUSIC

Tanglewood, U.S.A.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was in his favorite summer pasture last week, and frisky as a yearling. His costume—grey flannel trousers, blue flannel jacket, white wool beret and white shoes—made him look like a jaunty boulevardier at the beach. Visitors to Tanglewood, Dr. Koussevitzky's music colony near Lenox, Mass., try to compliment the maestro by calling it "an American Salzburg."

Maestro Koussevitzky thinks it no compliment. He bangs an angry, sunburned fist down on his piano. "Why a Salzburg?" he snaps. "Let's have courage to say it. In early stages Salzburg was ideal place—now it is the most commercialized thing you can imagine. Most people who come to Salzburg are snobs who come to say they have been in Salzburg. They must rehearse too quick, in a week, maybe less. Why not a Tanglewood, U.S.A.? We play here something that is more perfect than ever a performance in Salzburg. To make great art great artists have to rehearse."

Mountain Music. Outside and in a dozen nearby buildings, girls in slacks and boys in basque shirts scraped, fiddled, blew, banged and sang, and the noises elbowed each other like a musical Babel. Behind a boxed hemlock hedge a soprano and contralto sang a duet from Aïda, beyond another hedge a section of cellos rehearsed the minuet from Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F Major. In the Music Shed on the greensward a Brazilian conductor, who spoke no English, sign-signaled a student orchestra through a too-briskly gaited Afternoon of a Faun. Koussevitzky observed: "Maybe fine conductor for Brazilian music but he needs to be teached to change approach for European music." In Tanglewood's garage, a 40-member four-part chorus, struggling through a Hindemith chanson, was having soprano trouble. Conductor Robert Shaw pleaded: "No, girls, Wa ta is so wrong. Listen to the way the tenors do it . . . I want just a great big C sharp."

In the valley below Tanglewood's Victorian-gabled main house, Guernsey cows grazed amiably around the dairy barn. In the barn stalls a pianist raced through the Bach-Busoni Toccata in C Major; in the hayloft upstairs a madrigal group worked over Purcell's 17th-Century masque opera, King Arthur. Somewhere in a clump of birch a lone flutist piped the theme of Ravel's Daphnis et Chloé. Down by the shores of inky Lake Mahkeenac, a brass section blared Moussorgsky's A Night on Bald Mountain, and inside the lakeside clubhouse 23-year-old Composer Lukas Foss, a Koussevitzky favorite, beat out a frenzied boogie-woogie.

All This and Premières Too. Tanglewood, a 210-acre estate which Nathaniel Hawthorne used as a setting for his Tanglewood Tales, was given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1936. Two years later some of Koussevitzky's admirers built the Shed, an $80,000 fan-shaped acoustical dream.

For the Music Center's first season after a three-year war layoff, Koussevitzky & staff have handpicked 410 musicians, the majority under 30, from the U.S., Latin America and Canada. The summer's $100,000 budget is paid off by tuition fees (averaging $120 a student), ticket sales to festival concerts, and gifts. More than 100 students are there under the G.I. Bill of Rights. Aaron Copland, Koussevitzky's assistant director, trains eight young composers. Koussevitzky himself teaches three people how to conduct. At weekend concerts he listens carefully to their conducting efforts. Says he: "I see if they adopt what I tell them or whether they not. Then we begin again."

Next week, Tanglewood and its neighboring villages of Lenox and Stockbridge will be crammed with visitors anxious to hear what the rehearsing was about. They will hear the 110-man Boston Symphony Orchestra in nine concerts. U.S. premières: Dmitri Shostakovich's new and brief (25-minute) Ninth Symphony, which Koussevitzky enthusiastically describes as "absolutely classic in form until sometimes it is very near to Haydn," and Peter Grimes, a widely touted opera in English by England's Benjamin Britten, commissioned by Koussevitzky and first played in London in 1945. The student production will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein, most famous of Koussevitzky's bright young men.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who will be 72 next week, is as full of energy—and superlatives—as ever. Says he: "At Tanglewood we will have all the great writers and artists and musicians working together. We will compose tragedies of our life in the Greek manner. In America today we have tragedies not less than the Greeks."

Herbert Kubly

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY & PUPILS
Soprano trouble, Bach in the barn, boogie-woogie . . .

TIME, JULY 22, 1946

6—The Berkshire Evening Eagle, Monday, July 22, 1946

Final Concerts Presented In Bach-Mozart Series

William Kroll Is Violin Soloist in Week-End Programs—Regular Festival Concerts Begin Thursday in Large Shed

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The second of the two pairs of Bach-Mozart programs were given in the theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon and the previous evening. Serge Koussevitzky, leading the smaller orchestra but one appropriate to the music of the period played the Bach Second Brandenburg concerto, (in F major) and the D major suite (No. 4), and the Mozart Jupiter Symphony and, with William Kroll as soloist, the A major violin concerto. Attendance at yesterday's concert was 1100 and at Saturday night's 1500.

This completed the third series of this type of concert. It had been inaugurated during a war year, to keep alive the traditions of Tanglewood, despite the major restrictions of the day, but it had proved to be so treasured an event that its continuance in these days of unlimited travel was practically a command performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky had not only chosen his programs with sagacity and discernment, but had matched them with a personnel of comparable congruence. This final brace was elevated to unusual heights by the Mozart selections. The Koussevitzky "Jupiter" is a classic virtually engraved, with its last two companion symphonies, in the minds of the fortunate attendants at performances at which the Boston Orchestra appears. The basic outline of the performance is in such architectural balance and harmony, that it seems completely natural, and thus comparably simple, for the men of the orchestra to fill in the indications. It really isn't quite so elementary as that, but when something is right, it seems easy. We can recall how Big Bill Tilden always played tennis with so little effort because he seemed always to be where the ball was returned, or, to turn to an antipodal reference, a lofty nobility of artistic expression needs no "enforced ceremony." The purity of the string sections of the orchestra in their most soft passages and the lambent fluency of the wood winds were but a couple of the salient features of the performance. The maintenance of the dynamic balance in the exaggerated tempo of the last movement was no mean feat, either.

Kroll Is Soloist

William Kroll made his Tanglewood debut as soloist last year when he appeared in the Mozart "Symphonie Concertante." At that time he established a plane by which his later appearances were to be anticipated. His Mozart concerto now brought to Tanglewood a pinacle of Mozartean revelation. With his limitless violinistic facilities, he invested the concerto with a youthfully buoyant vitality and poised spaciousness which lent a fresh significance to the beautiful music. His marvellously adjusted sense of rhythm was tempered with the most mature refinement, and whether in the more reflective or the more spirited moments, there was an elegance which always lifted it above the commonplace. There was not a phrase, indeed a note, which he did not adorn with his sensitive and distinctive tone, not an artistic decision he did not resolve with the highest discrimination, all details aiming toward the purist stylistic felicity. Mr. Kroll was recalled innumerable times and was accorded a thoroughly deserved triumph.

The Bach choices lacked the impact which those of the later composer possessed. The difficult trumpet of the second Brandenburg is an accomplishment which Roger Voisin achieved meritoriously, and the other soloists, Richard Burgin, violin, Georges Laurent, flute, and Fernand Gillet, oboe, made the most of their assignments, but it is neither right nor possible for them to emerge from the more solid background which Bach provided to win the recognition which the printed program might seem to indicate.

D Major Suite Played

The suite has great variety, and, after the overture, reached an engaging diversity of rhythmic patterns. Koussevitzky's Bach is basically sound and wholesome. There is even a desired guttural element which he evokes by demanding a certain force and power from his men, which is all the more effective because of the equally quick responsiveness he has on instant call in moments of the most contrasting grace.

Saturday evening the weather, which is always a consideration at Tanglewood, was warm but favorable and kind. Yesterday afternoon, as if to be a constantly-willing stooge to a tempted punster, it provided just enough rain to permit the trite allusion to Pluvius during the performance of the "Jupiter." Tomorrow night there will be the final chamber music concert in the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation series, after which Festival activities will move over to the big shed where, on Thursday, the first of the programs with the large, full orchestra will take place.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

JUL 22 1946

SUMMER MUSIC

The Berkshire Music Festival, to be opened later in the month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at "Tanglewood" in Lenox, Mass. is drawing attention from music lovers far and near.

The first of two Bach-Mozart preliminary concert programs, given indoors last week, was attended by 1,200. The main festival in the out of door music shed, is expected to attract its full capacity of 6,000. The Berkshire project is only one of many whose popularity bear witness to the growing love of good music in this country.

The beginnings of the modern music festival hark back to such old world institutions as the German minnesingers, French troubadours and the Welsh eisteddfodan. As early as 1697, annual services of music had begun at St. Paul's in London. The Handel commemorations at Westminster Abbey started in 1784. In later years, annual festivals attracted musical enthusiasts from all over the world to Vienna, to the lower Rhine cities and to the Wagnerian opera at Bayreuth.

The American festival, consisting of a series of noteworthy concerts given annually on two or more successive days, frequently as a tribute to some composer, was started in Boston and Worcester, Mass. in 1857 and 1858. Among many springing up after the Civil War were the Cincinnati, Ohio Biennial and the famous Bach Festivals in Bethlehem, Pa. The MacDowell Association began a series in Peterboro, N. H., in 1910, followed in 1917 by the first Berkshire Festival, fostered by Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge.

Eclipsed by the war, in common with such things on the continent, the score or more of important European music festivals that once followed each other from April through September yearly are hardly more than a memory. Revival of many of them will certainly be attempted. Meanwhile more and more interest is being focussed on the excellent summer musical events being offered to the public across the country in the United States.

The symphonies Under the Stars, in the Hollywood Bowl, attended by as many as 25,000 at one time, can be heard for as little as 33 cents apiece for the season. In a setting restored to 18th century elegance, the Williamsburg, Va. festival was resumed this year after a wartime lapse. Many college campuses, too, are now being used for festivals.

Increasingly popular, though, of a different order, are the outdoor concerts for summer audiences given by most of the civic symphony orchestras. Among the best known are the watergate concerts on the Potomac given by the National Symphony, those by the Philadelphia group at Robin Hood Dell, the San Francisco and Chicago open air series, and Arthur Fiedler's Esplanade concerts in oBston.

A step in the same direction has been taken by St. George's School here, in bringing to Newport for the second summer season the Gordon String Quartet, one of the best known string ensembles of the country, for a six concert series. In offering this musical treat to the community the school once more demonstrates the attitude of neighborliness and civic co-operation shown so many times in the past.

---

16 Officers Assigned to Tanglewood

Uniformed Detail To Succeed Legion Men Who Were Volunteers

With the resumption of the Berkshire Festival concerts this week hat will attract thousands of nusic lovers from all parts of the ountry, George E. Judd, manager f the Boston Symphony Orchesra has announced that 16 uniormed police officers from Pittsield, Lenox and Stockbridge will andle the parking. This will be departure from prewar days vhen members of the American Legion in the county performed this ervice on a volunteer basis.

In a letter to Sheriff J. Bruce McIntyre, Mr. Judd asked the sheriff to express the orchestra's gratiude to all who helped "in the preliminary years which have led o this enlarged program." The paid force is being organized by Bartholomew W. Barry of Lenox. State police will have charge of traffic outside Tanglewood limits.

The letter follows:

With the resumption of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, following the close of the great war, and with the transfer by the festival association to the orchestra of the responsibility for all aspects of the program, the trustees of the orchestra have authorized considerable investment in the improvement of the parking fields by the installation of drainage, new roads and walks, extra lighting, etc. These physical improvements were arrived at after consultation with experienced engineers. Partly on their recommendation, but also because of the extended program (some 42 events in all this summer) it was no longer reasonable to ask for a continuation of the generous and invaluable services which the members of the Legion under your direction have rendered the nine Festival concerts in the past. Consequently, as you already know, we have endeavored to set up a staff to serve the parking requirements here on a professional, as contrasted with a voluntary basis.

The real occasion for this letter is to ask you to be so good as to express the orchestra's gratitude to all your members who helped in the preliminary years which have led up to this enlarged program. Will you also be so good as to say to your colleagues that the change has been dictated entirely by circumstances—circumstances which I have tried to outline briefly above.

I cannot close without a word of personal appreciation for all the time and effort and good will which the Festival has enjoyed at your hands over the past 10 years.

MUSIC

Tanglewood, U.S.A.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was in his favorite summer pasture last week, and frisky as a yearling. His costume—grey flannel trousers, blue flannel jacket, white wool beret and white shoes—made him look like a jaunty boulevardier at the beach. Visitors to Tanglewood, Dr. Koussevitzky's music colony near Lenox, Mass., try to compliment the maestro by calling it "an American Salzburg."

Maestro Koussevitzky thinks it no compliment. He bangs an angry, sunburned fist down on his piano. "Why a Salzburg?" he snaps. "Let's have courage to say it. In early stages Salzburg was ideal place—now it is the most commercialized thing you can imagine. Most people who come to Salzburg are snobs who come to say they have been in Salzburg. They must rehearse too quick, in a week, maybe less. Why not a Tanglewood, U.S.A.? We play here something that is more perfect than ever a performance in Salzburg. To make great art great artists have to rehearse."

Mountain Music. Outside and in a dozen nearby buildings, girls in slacks and boys in basque shirts scraped, fiddled, blew, banged and sang, and the noises elbowed each other like a musical Babel. Behind a boxed hemlock hedge a soprano and contralto sang a duet from Aïda, beyond another hedge a section of cellos rehearsed the minuet from Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F Major. In the Music Shed on the greensward a Brazilian conductor, who spoke no English, sign-signaled a student orchestra through a too-briskly gaited Afternoon of a Faun. Koussevitzky observed: "Maybe fine conductor for Brazilian music but he needs to be teached to change approach for European music." In Tanglewood's garage, a 40-member four-part chorus, struggling through a Hindemith chanson, was having soprano trouble. Conductor Robert Shaw pleaded: "No, girls, Wa ta is so wrong. Listen to the way the tenors do it . . . I want just a great big C sharp."

In the valley below Tanglewood's Victorian-gabled main house, Guernsey cows grazed amiably around the dairy barn. In the barn stalls a pianist raced through the Bach-Busoni Toccata in C Major; in the hayloft upstairs a madrigal group worked over Purcell's 17th-Century masque opera, King Arthur. Somewhere in a clump of birch a lone flutist piped the theme of Ravel's Daphnis et Chloé. Down by the shores of inky Lake Mahkeenac, a brass section blared Moussorgsky's A Night on Bald Mountain, and inside the lakeside clubhouse 23-year-old Composer Lukas Foss, a Koussevitzky favorite, beat out a frenzied boogie-woogie.

All This and Premières Too. Tanglewood, a 210-acre estate which Nathaniel Hawthorne used as a setting for his Tanglewood Tales, was given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1936. Two years later some of Koussevitzky's admirers built the Shed, an $80,000 fan-shaped acoustical dream.

For the Music Center's first season after a three-year war layoff, Koussevitzky & staff have handpicked 410 musicians, the majority under 30, from the U.S., Latin America and Canada. The summer's $100,000 budget is paid off by tuition fees (averaging $120 a student), ticket sales to festival concerts, and gifts. More than 100 students are there under the G.I. Bill of Rights. Aaron Copland, Koussevitzky's assistant director, trains eight young composers. Koussevitzky himself teaches three people how to conduct. At weekend concerts he listens carefully to their conducting efforts. Says he: "I see if they adopt what I tell them or whether they not. Then we begin again."

Next week, Tanglewood and its neighboring villages of Lenox and Stockbridge will be crammed with visitors anxious to hear what the rehearsing was about. They will hear the 110-man Boston Symphony Orchestra in nine concerts. U.S. premières: Dmitri Shostakovich's new and brief (25-minute) Ninth Symphony, which Koussevitzky enthusiastically describes as "absolutely classic in form until sometimes it is very near to Haydn," and Peter Grimes, a widely touted opera in English by England's Benjamin Britten, commissioned by Koussevitzky and first played in London in 1945. The student production will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein, most famous of Koussevitzky's bright young men.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who will be 72 next week, is as full of energy—and superlatives—as ever. Says he: "At Tanglewood we will have all the great writers and artists and musicians working together. We will compose tragedies of our life in the Greek manner. In America today we have tragedies not less than the Greeks."

Herbert Kubly

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY & PUPILS
Soprano trouble, Bach in the barn, boogie-woogie . . .

TIME, JULY 22, 1946

---

16 Officers Assigned to Tanglewood

Uniformed Detail To Succeed Legion Men Who Were Volunteers

With the resumption of the Berkshire Festival concerts this week that will attract thousands of music lovers from all parts of the country, George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that 16 uniformed police officers from Pittsfield, Lenox and Stockbridge will handle the parking. This will be a departure from prewar days when members of the American Legion in the county performed this service on a volunteer basis.

In a letter to Sheriff J. Bruce McIntyre, Mr. Judd asked the sheriff to express the orchestra's gratitude to all who helped "in the preliminary years which have led to this enlarged program." The paid force is being organized by Bartholomew W. Barry of Lenox. State police will have charge of traffic outside Tanglewood limits.

The letter follows:

With the resumption of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, following the close of the great war, and with the transfer by the festival association to the orchestra of the responsibility for all aspects of the program, the trustees of the orchestra have authorized considerable investment in the improvement of the parking fields by the installation of drainage, new roads and walks, extra lighting, etc. These physical improvements were arrived at after consultation with experienced engineers. Partly on their recommendation, but also because of the extended program (some 42 events in all this summer) it was no longer reasonable to ask for a continuation of the generous and invaluable services which the members of the Legion under your direction have rendered the nine Festival concerts in the past. Consequently, as you already know, we have endeavored to set up a staff to serve the parking requirements here on a professional, as contrasted with a voluntary basis.

The real occasion for this letter is to ask you to be so good as to express the orchestra's gratitude to all your members who helped in the preliminary years which have led up to this enlarged program. Will you also be so good as to say to your colleagues that the change has been dictated entirely by circumstances—circumstances which I have tried to outline briefly above.

I cannot close without a word of personal appreciation for all the time and effort and good will which the Festival has enjoyed at your hands over the past 10 years.

6—The Berkshire Evening Eagle, Monday, July 22, 1946

Final Concerts Presented In Bach-Mozart Series

William Kroll Is Violin Soloist in Week-End Programs—Regular Festival Concerts Begin Thursday in Large Shed

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The second of the two pairs of Bach-Mozart programs were given in the theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon and the previous evening. Serge Koussevitzky, leading the smaller orchestra but one appropriate to the music of the period played the Bach Second Brandenburg concerto, (in F major) and the D major suite (No. 4), and the Mozart Jupiter Symphony and, with William Kroll as soloist, the A major violin concerto. Attendance at yesterday's concert was 1100 and at Saturday night's 1500.

This completed the third series of this type of concert. It had been inaugurated during a war year, to keep alive the traditions of Tanglewood, despite the major restrictions of the day, but it had proved to be so treasured an event that its continuance in these days of unlimited travel was practically a command performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky had not only chosen his programs with sagacity and discernment, but had matched them with a personnel of comparable congruence. This final brace was elevated to unusual heights by the Mozart selections. The Koussevitzky "Jupiter" is a classic virtually engraved, with its last two companion symphonies, in the minds of the fortunate attendants at performances at which the Boston Orchestra appears. The basic outline of the performance is in such architectural balance and harmony, that it seems completely natural, and thus comparably simple, for the men of the orchestra to fill in the indications. It really isn't quite so elementary as that, but when something is right, it seems easy. We can recall how Big Bill Tilden always played tennis with so little effort because he seemed always to be where the ball was returned, or, to turn to an antipodal reference, a lofty nobility of artistic expression needs no "enforced ceremony." The purity of the string sections of the orchestra in their most soft passages and the lambent fluency of the wood winds were but a couple of the salient features of the performance. The maintenance of the dynamic balance in the exaggerated tempo of the last movement was no mean feat, either.

Kroll Is Soloist

William Kroll made his Tanglewood debut as soloist last year when he appeared in the Mozart "Symphonie Concertante." At that time he established a plane by which his later appearances were to be anticipated. His Mozart concerto now brought to Tanglewood a pinacle of Mozartean revelation. With his limitless violinistic facilities, he invested the concerto with a youthfully buoyant vitality and poised spaciousness which lent a fresh significance to the beautiful music. His marvellously adjusted sense of rhythm was tempered with the most mature refinement, and whether in the more reflective or the more spirited moments, there was an elegance which always lifted it above the commonplace. There was not a phrase, indeed a note, which he did not adorn with his sensitive and distinctive tone, not an artistic decision he did not resolve with the highest discrimination, all details aiming toward the purist stylistic felicity. Mr. Kroll was recalled innumerable times and was accorded a thoroughly deserved triumph.

The Bach choices lacked the impact which those of the later composer possessed. The difficult trumpet of the second Brandenburg is an accomplishment which Roger Voisin achieved meritoriously, and the other soloists, Richard Burgin, violin, Georges Laurent, flute, and Fernand Gillet, oboe, made the most of their assignments, but it is neither right nor possible for them to emerge from the more solid background which Bach provided to win the recognition which the printed program might seem to indicate.

D Major Suite Played

The suite has great variety, and, after the overture, reached an engaging diversity of rhythmic patterns. Koussevitzky's Bach is basically sound and wholesome. There is even a desired guttural element which he evokes by demanding a certain force and power from his men, which is all the more effective because of the equally quick responsiveness he has on instant call in moments of the most contrasting grace.

Saturday evening the weather, which is always a consideration at Tanglewood, was warm but favorable and kind. Yesterday afternoon, as if to be a constantly-willing stooge to a tempted punster, it provided just enough rain to permit the trite allusion to Pluvius during the performance of the "Jupiter." Tomorrow night there will be the final chamber music concert in the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation series, after which Festival activities will move over to the big shed where, on Thursday, the first of the programs with the large, full orchestra will take place.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

JUL 22 1946

SUMMER MUSIC

The Berkshire Music Festival, to be opened later in the month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at "Tanglewood" in Lenox, Mass. is drawing attention from music lovers far and near.

The first of two Bach-Mozart preliminary concert programs, given indoors last week, was attended by 1,200. The main festival in the out of door music shed, is expected to attract its full capacity of 6,000. The Berkshire project is only one of many whose popularity bear witness to the growing love of good music in this country.

The beginnings of the modern music festival hark back to such old world institutions as the German minnesingers, French troubadours and the Welsh eisteddfodan. As early as 1697, annual services of music had begun at St. Paul's in London. The Handel commemorations at Westminster Abbey started in 1784. In later years, annual festivals attracted musical enthusiasts from all over the world to Vienna, to the lower Rhine cities and to the Wagnerian opera at Bayreuth.

The American festival, consisting of a series of noteworthy concerts given annually on two or more successive days, frequently as a tribute to some composer, was started in Boston and Worcester, Mass. in 1857 and 1858. Among many springing up after the Civil War were the Cincinnati Ohio Biennial and the famous Bach Festivals in Bethlehem, Pa. The MacDowell Association began a series in Peterboro, N. H., in 1910, followed in 1917 by the first Berkshire Festival, fostered by Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge.

Eclipsed by the war, in common with such things on the continent, the score or more of important European music festivals that once followed each other from April through September yearly are hardly more than a memory. Revival of many of them will certainly be attempted. Meanwhile more and more interest is being focussed on the excellent summer musical events being offered to the public across the country in the United States.

The symphonies Under the Stars in the Hollywood Bowl, attended by as many as 25,000 at one time, can be heard for as little as 35 cents apiece for the season. In a setting restored to 18th century elegance, the Williamsburg, Va. festival was resumed this year after a wartime lapse. Many college campuses, too, are now being used for festivals.

Increasingly popular, though of a different order, are the outdoor concerts for summer audiences given by most of the civic symphony orchestras. Among the best known are the watergate concerts on the Potomac given by the National Symphony, those by the Philadelphia group at Robin Hood Dell, the San Francisco and Chicago open air series, and Arthur Fiedler's Esplanade concerts in oBston.

A step in the same direction has been taken by St. George's School here, in bringing to Newport for the second summer season the Gordon String Quartet, one of the best known string ensembles of the country, for a six concert series. In offering this musical treat to the community the school once more demonstrates the attitude of neighborliness and civic co-operation shown so many times in the past.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JUL 22 1946

KROLL IS SOLOIST FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Lenox, Mass., July 21.—When the man next to you turned and said: "That was the most perfect playing of a musical work I have ever heard," all you could do was nod your head in agreement—and forgive him the double superlative. For "that" was a performance of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony which last night climaxed the second series of pre-festivals directed by Serge Koussevitzky in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall, and gave one a new idea of how well thirty-eight men can play together.

Similar to last week's pair, these concerts were devoted to works of Bach and Mozart, with William Kroll admitted to the exclusive circle of Boston Symphony men to play the latter's A major violin concerto. But the appearance on the program of this work and the C major ("Jupiter") symphony of Mozart permitted one to compare directly the playing with memories of more conventional performances — wherefore the double superlative and the mute agreement.

Indeed, so successful was Koussevitzky's projection of his ideas about the "Jupiter," its brilliant yet mellow clarity, its vivacity and sparkle, that one almost agreed that it should be played that way. It was altogether a triumph of mechanics, of preparation so careful and devoted that the whole mass of sound reached the ear as it must have sounded in Mozart's mind, with no element predominating and none slighted.

But it remained a giddy experience in the realm of pure sound, rather than an inspired revelation of the emotions that motivated the sounds. To his credit, Koussevitzky achieved the best unity of thought and expression in the slow movement, which had a beautifully reflective mood, a sublime harmoniousness of pace and accent. Against this, one recalls a minuet that was delicate rather than measured, a last movement that, for all its virtuosity of planning and execution, was more mercurial than Jovian. But it will remain, in many specialized ways, a standard to which one will revert again and again.

Kroll Is Soloist.

To the credit of Kroll, it can be said that he took his place in this ensemble of virtuosi as one good man among three dozen others. His playing of the solo part in the concerto was lucidity itself, with a degree of stylish tone and evenness of articulation one has not always associated with him. He asserted the wisdom of his choice by Koussevitzky with a performance that was all deftness and polish, neat in its punctuations, warm and supple in its flow of feeling.

The audience which filled the well-proportioned hall also heard choice performances of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 (in which the soloists were Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and Roger Voisin) and the same composer's suite in D, No. 4. Though some may have been disappointed to discover that this was not the other Bach suite in D (No. 3), with the famous "Air," it would be a cross-patch indeed who wouldn't have been delighted with its magnificent tunes and the superb playing of them. The formal festival, with the full orchestra taking part, begins on Thursday night when the Shostakovich Ninth Symphony will have its first American performance.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 23 1946

Cast for 'Peter Grimes' Selected at Tanglewood

The cast for "Peter Grimes," the opera by Benjamin Britten, British composer, at its first American performance at Tanglewood, Lenox, Aug. 6, 7 and 9, has been chosen from the 400 students at the Berkshire Music Center.

The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute, both of New York City. The leading soprano part will be taken alternately by Miss Frances Yeend of the state of Washington, and Miss Florence Manning of New York.

Like all events at the school the opera by invitation to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. The composer, and Eric Crozier, who directed the world premiere in London, are on their way from England to supervise the production.

* * *

FOR THE QUARTET for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with which [redacted]tzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will close the Berkshire Festival, Aug. 11, Miss Yeend has been selected as the soprano; Miss Eunice Alberts of Brookline, Mass., contralto; Mr. Laderoute, tenor, and James Passe of New York, bass.

In the coming week, events at Tanglewood will include—in addition to the festival concerts starting Thursday evening and continuing every Thursday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for the next three weekends—a chamber music concert tonight at 8:15 by the Berkshire Chamber Orchestra, directed by Louis Spayer, last of the series of four under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation; a lecture-recital Thursday afternoon at 4:30, illustrated by piano and slides by Albert V. Frankenstein, music editor of The San Francisco Chronicle, on Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," to be played at the opening concert; a lecture on "The Art of Criticism" by Olin Downes, music editor of The New York Times, Friday at 4:30.

On Saturday, at 10 a. m., there will be a public rehearsal of the Boston Orchestra at a nominal fee for the benefit of the pension fund; a choral concert Saturday at 2:30; a chamber music concert by Gregor Piatigorsky's chamber music group Sunday at 10:30 a. m.

With all seats sold for the past three weeks the festival concerts Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoon will be open to those seeking admission to the grounds at the box office the days of the concerts. At the last concert in 1941 more persons heard the music from the lawn than from seats in the shed.

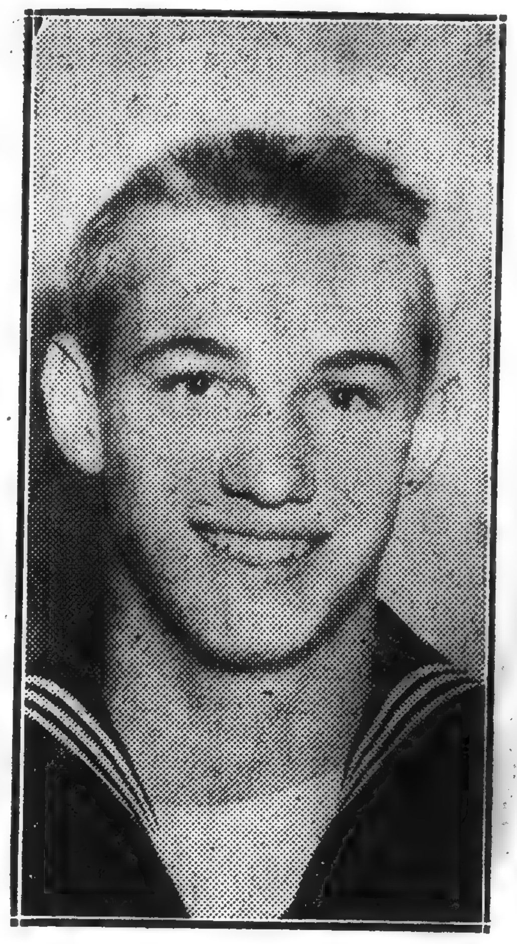
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JUL 23 1946

Dr. ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~, director of the Berkshire Music center and conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, willl deliver a brief address on "The Future of Tanglewood" on Aug. 2 at 8:50 p.m. at the Berkshire museum in Pittsfield, Mass. The address will be given as part of the program of the annual summer "Members's Night."

July 23

Welcome Home



F. Talmage Edman

F. Talmage Edman, fire controlman third class, was discharged from the Navy Sunday at Boston and is now at home, 564 South Street.

He enlisted in 1945 upon graduation from Phillips Andover Academy at Andover and took his boot training at Sampson. He then was assigned to the U.S.S. Topeka, a light cruiser, as a seaman second class. The Topeka sailed from California last January. He was subsequently promoted to seaman first class and a few weeks ago was promoted to fire controlman third class. During his period of service, all in Pacific waters, he was in Hawaii, Japan, China, the Philippines and Guam. He expects to enter Yale University in September.

HARTFORD TIMES

JUL 2

MUSIC STUDENTS—Bettina Roulier, cellist, of 153 Buena Vista Rd., West Hartrford; Clara Chittenden, violinist, of 24 Fairview Ave., Naugatuck; and Madelyn Robb, pianist, of 15 Buckingham St., Waterbury, study score on lawn at Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., where they are members of the orchestra department.

FACULTY—Aaron Copland, composer and assistant director of the school, discusses over lunch on the lawn a problem with Irving Vine, faculty member of Harvard and the Center, and Mrs. Fine.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 22 1946

POLICEMEN RECRUITED FOR MUSIC FESTIVAL

Pittsfield, July 21—Sixteen uniformed policemen from Pittsfield, Lenox and Stockbridge are to be on duty for each of the coming nine Berkshire festival Boston Symphony orchestra concerts [redacted] Thursday night.

The paid force is being organized by Bartholomew W. Barry, special officer at Lenox. They will be on duty in the parking areas, gardens and grounds. State police will have charge of traffic outside of Tanglewood limits.

[197]

BERKSHIRE EVENING EAGLE

Pittsfield, Massachusetts. Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Latin Americans Entertained by Berles

Eight musicians from Latin America, who are studying at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, were the luncheon guests of Adolf A. Berle Jr., former U.S. ambassador to Brazil, and Mrs. Berle at their summer home in Great Barrington Sunday. Left to right, first row are: Eleazar deCarvalho, assistant conductor of the Rio de Janeiro (Brazil) Orchestra, a student of conducting under Serge Koussevitzky; Miss Merces Silva-Telles, pianist and journalist, a week-end guest; Raul Spivak, Argentinian pianist; Juan Orrego, choral conductor from Santiago, Chile; second row: Mr. Berle; Mrs. Alberto Ginastera; Mrs. Estevez; Mrs. Spivak; Mrs. Orrego; Oscar y Buenaventura of Bogota, Colombia; standing: Dr. Alberto Carneiro, Brazilian delegate to the United Nations Health Committee; Antonio Jose Estevez of Caracas, Venezuela; Mrs. Berle; Aaron Copland, composer and assistant director of the Center; Mr. Ginastera, one of the best known composers of Buenos Aires, Argentina; Hector Tosar, pianist and composer of Montevideo, Uruguay; Claudio Spies of Santiago, student at New England Conservatory of Music.

July 23

'Peter Grimes' Principals Are Selected

Koussevitzky Picks Quartet From Music Center Students

Principals have been selected for the first American performance of the opera, "Peter Grimes," to be given at Tanglewood Aug. 6, 7 and 9, and the quartet for Beethoven's ninth symphony, to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky as the finale of the Berkshire Festival Aug. 11.

As a result of auditions held last week, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen for the quartet four singers now studying in the Berkshire Music Center. The soloists will be Miss Frances Yeend of the state of Washington, soprano; Miss Eunice Alberts, of Brookline, contralto; Joseph Laderoute of Canada, tenor, and James Pease of Indiana, bass.

The title role in "Peter Grimes," written by the British composer, Benjamin Britten, as a commission by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, will be sung alternately by William Horne of New York City and Mr. Laderoute; the leading soprano part (Ellen) by Miss Yeend and Miss Florence Manning of New York.

Other members of the cast will be: Balstrode, Mr. Pease; Miss Ellen Carleen of Audubon, N. J.; Miss Irene Jordan, New York City; Miss Frances Lehnerts, New York; Miss Mildred Mueller, Cleveland, Ohio; Miss Phyllis Smith, Clarksburg, Va.; Duane Crossley, Philadelphia; Paul Franke, New York; Robert Gay, Chicago; Paul Knowles, Cleveland; Matthew Lockhart, Brookline; Robert Long, Seville, Ohio; Leonard Treash, Berea, Ohio; Frederic Zighera, Brookline.

Richard Rychtarik will be stage designer. The composer and Eric Crozier, who directed the world premiere at Sadlers' Wells theatre, London, are on their way to Tanglewood to supervise the production.

Friends of the Berkshire Music Center are invited to request tickets for the opera, for which seats will be reserved.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS. REPUBLICAN

JUL 23 1946

KOUSSEVITZKY TO TALK AT BERKSHIRE MUSEUM

Famous Conductor Will Tell of Tanglewood's Future On 'Members' Night

Pittsfield, July 22—Invitations have been issued for the annual summer "Members'" night of Berkshire museum, to be held Friday, August 2, from 8 to 11.30. The program includes a brief address by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, on "The future of Tanglewood." He will tell of its significance as a world center for musical education.

There will be an exhibit portraying "The History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," including portraits of the founder, the great conductors and artists. A large exhibit of French impressionist painting will be shown.

The program also includes a new color sound movie produced by Dr Frank H. Howard, president of the California Ski association, entitled "Ski Three." There will be on view photographs by Charles H. Vickery of Pittsfield, widely known for his camera technic. The Kingman-Bullock trio will play and refreshments will be served in the Ellen Crane Memorial room.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS. NEWS

JUL 23 1946

'PETER GRIMES' CAST IS CHOSEN AT TANGLEWOOD

Laderonte, Horne Alternate in Opera Leads; Festival Opens Thursday

Lenox, July 23—The cast for "Peter Grimes," the opera by Benjamin Britten, British composer, to be given its first American performance at Tanglewood, Lenox, August 6, 7 and 9, has been chosen from the 400 students at the Berkshire Music center.

The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute of New York city. The leading soprano part will be taken alternately by Miss Frances Yeend of the state of Washington and Miss Florence Manning of New York.

Like all events at the school, the opera will be open by invitation to members of the Society of the Friends of the Berkshire Music center. The composer and Eric Crozier, who directed the world premier in London, are on their way from England to supervise the production.

For the quartet for Beethoven's Ninth symphony, with which Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra will close the Berkshire festival August 11, Miss Yeend has been selected as the soprano; Miss Eunice Alberts of Brookline, Mass., contralto; Mr Laderoute, tenor; and James Pease of New York, bass.

Schedule for Week

In the coming week, events at Tanglewood will include, in addition to the festival concerts starting Thursday evening and continuing every Thursday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for the next three weekends, a chamber music concert tonight at 8.15 by the Berkshire Chamber orchestra directed by Louis Speyer, last of the series of four under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge foundation; a lecture-recital Thursday afternoon at 4.30, illustrated by piano and slides by Albert V. Frankenstein, music editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, on Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," to be played at the opening concert; a lecture on "The art of criticism" by Olin Downes, music editor of the New York Times, Friday at 4.30; a public rehearsal of the Boston orchestra Saturday morning at 10, at a nominal fee for the benefit of the pension fund; a choral concert Saturday at 2.30; a chamber music concert by Gregor Piatigorsky's chamber music group Sunday morning at 10.30.

With all seats sold for the past three weeks, the festival concerts Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoon will be open to those seeking admission to the grounds at the box office the days of the concerts. At the last concert in 1941, more persons heard the music from the lawn than from 6000 seats in the shed.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS. EVENING UNION

JUL 24 1946

Greason Resumes Tanglewood Study

GREENFIELD, July 24 — Donald Greason, resident artist at Deerfield Academy the last five years, and now a resident of Colrain, has returned to his study of Serge Koussevitzky an dthe Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, which was interrupted by the war.

Mr. Greason has a studio on Brushwood Farm, the old William Cullen Bryant estate in Lenox, for the three weeks of the music festival. A group of paintings and drawings of the musicians by him is to be a feature of the exhibition, "the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," at the Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield where Greason has previously held two one man shows.

He is the first artist ever to make an exhaustive study of this subject of a major orchestra and the work has been widely shown in museums and galleries from New England to Virginia.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES

JUL 24 1946

PIATIGORSKY TO USE 250-YEAR-OLD 'CELLO

The famous 250-year-old Stradivarius 'cello known as the "Lord Aylesford," will be used for the first time in an American concert on Sunday, Aug. 4, at Tanglewood in the Berkshire Festival, when it will be played by its new owner, Gregor Piatigorsky. The 'cellist acquired the instrument a few weeks ago for an undisclosed price.

The "Lord Aylesford" was made by Antonio Stradivari in 1696 in Cremona. Of the fifty Stradivarius 'celli known today, fewer than ten are said to be in perfect condition, with the "Lord Aylesford" believed to be one of the finest. The instrument was taken from Italy to London in 1780 and bought by Lord Aylesford. Later it passed into other private hands. After the owner's death in 1941, long negotiations with the family by Emil Herrmann of this city, a dealer, resulted in the purchase by Mr. Piatigorsky.

With the acquisition of the "Lord Aylesford," Mr. Piatigorsky said he had no intention of abandoning his "Sleeping Princess," the 1739 Montagnana which he has used since he bought it in London in 1934 after it had been buried in an English country estate in a collection of rare instruments for nearly a century.

At its first appearance in this country, the "Lord Aylesford" will be used by Mr. Piatigorsky for the Brahms Double Concerto in A minor, with Erica Morini playing the violin part, and Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be heard a second time in the Berkshire Festival on the next Thursday evening in the Schumann 'Cello Concerto. Mr. Piatigorsky will use it in his American tours next season.

This Clipping From
N. ADAMS, MASS. TRANSCRIPT

JUL 25 1946

250-Year Old Stradivarius Cello to Be Heard at Lenox

A famous 250-year-old Stradivarius 'cello known as the "Lord Aylesford," will be used for the first time in an American concert on Sunday, Aug. 4, at Tanglewood, Lenox, in the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, when it will be played by its new owner, Gregor Piatigorsky. The 'cellist acquired the instrument a few weeks ago for an undisclosed price.

The "Lord Aylesford" was made by Antonio Stradivari in 1669 in Cremona. Of the 50 Stradivarius 'celli known today, fewer than 10 are said to be in perfect condition, with the "Lord Aylesford" believed to be one of the finest. The instrument was taken from Italy to London in 1780 and bought by Lord Aylesford. Later it passed int other private hands. After the owner's death in 1941, long negotiation with the family by Emil Herrma of New York, a dealer, resulted i the purchase by Mr. Piatigorsky.

With the acquisition of th "Lord Aylesford," Mr. Piatigorsk said he had no intention of abandoning his "Sleeping Princess," the 1739 Montagnana which he has used since he bought it in London in 1934 after it had been buried in an English country estate in a collection of rare instruments for nearly a century.

At its first appearance in this country, the "Lord Aylesford" will be used by Mr. Piatigorsky for the Brahms double concerto in A minor, with Erica Morini playing the ~~violin~~ part, and ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~ conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra. It will be heard a second time in the Berkshire festival on Thursday evening, Aug. 8, in the Schuman 'cello concerto. Mr. Piatigorsky will use it in his American tours next season.

TANGLEWOOD PROGRAM

1946 Berkshire Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Here are the program dates for the famous Tanglewood Berkshire Music Festival, where thousands from all over the United States will gather.

Series A — July 25 at 8.15 P. M.; July 27, at 8.15 P. M., July 28 at 3.30 P. M.

Series B — Aug. 1 at 8.15 P. M.; Aug. 3 at 8.15 P. M.; August 4 at 3.30 P. M.

Series C —— Aug. 8 at 8.15 P. M.; Aug. 10 at 8.15 P. M.; Aug. 11 at 3.30 P. M.

This is the program of the Festival proper which takes place in the Shed. Opening night, July 25, will feature the American premier of Shostakovitch's famous Ninth Symphony which was written during the Battle of Leningrad.

You are invited to go early in order to enjoy the gardens and picnics on the lawns. The parking fields at Tanglewood are free. The gates open at 6 P. M. on Thursdays and Saturdays and at 12 noon on Sundays. The program (last day) will end with Thompson's famous Testament to Freedom.

Will Plouffe

THEIR NAMES MEAN MUSIC: Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, and Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, "patron saint" of chamber music in the U.S., get together at intermission. The occasion was the closing concert last night at Tanglewood of the series given under auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress.

July 24

Chamber Series Ends, Prelude to Festival

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The fourth and final concert of the chamber music series in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood last night proved a fitting climax to a memorable series and a perfect prelude to the main Festival concerts which open tomorrow night in the big Shed under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky.

Premiere Given

Arranged and directed by Louis Speyer through the co-operative generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress the completely contemporary program included a premiere and a first performance in America which added interest and distinction to the evening. Following Aaron Copland's sextet for violin, string quartet and clarinet came Arthur Lourie's "Naissance de la Beaute" which had never been heard in this country before. Mr. Lourie, writing on a text of Jules Supervielle, for a soprano solo, six soprano parts, clarinet, bassoon, harpsichord and small cymbals, immediately showed his artistic judgment by the effect his instruments made, reiterating a droning idiom, in support of the 12 beautiful young sopranos whom Hugh Ross had trained so skillfully and whom Mr. Speyer directed with dynamic authority. The soloist was Valentina Vishnevska. Mr. Lourie had allotted her portions in only the first two of the four divisions of his cantata. It would seem on first hearing that her failure to emerge above the background was either the intention or the fault of the composer, for, in a later opportunity, she proved that her voice was adequate, to say the least.

Mr. Louri succeeded in producing a classical Grecian mood, and under the definite baton of Mr. Speyer, in developing his story, for which Botticelli's "Birth of Venus" had been the original inspiration, into a homogeneous composition. The singing of the chorus was deserving of special mention, as was Mr. Lourie's keen ingenuity in selecting and grouping the instruments he used.

Mr. Lourie's effective choral writing found the happiest possible experssion in the alert and sonorous voices chosen from among the students of the Music Center.

Dedicated to Mrs. Coolidge

The world premiere was "Le Sette Allegresse d'Amore," a composition by Francesco Malipiero on Lorenzo de'Medici's beautiful poem. Mr. Malipiero has dedicated this new work to Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, and has scored it for a soprano and 14 instruments, of which eight are strings, four woodwind and one a harp. Here Madame Vishnevska had the whole narrative to sing with elegantly subdued accompaniment from Mr. Speyer. Her voice now proved to be tenderly warm and capable of gentle inflection. The instrumental writing was softly voluptuous as suited the text. It was luscious even though comparatively conventional.

Mr. Copland's sextet has structural unity, but it is not convincingly blended nor adapted for the instruments. The jerky percussive nature of the first movement influenced Lukas Foss at the piano to overbalance his colleagues, and Viktor Polatschek, clarinet, at times found himself blowing in total musical obscurity. The three movements are played without pause, and rhythmic interest is stimulated by frequent use of jazz idioms. Mr. Copland's harmonic sense commands respect, and there is skillful craftmanship apparent in the entity of his sextet, but the jolting progress of the first movement makes it less than convincing. He won great favor with the public, however, as well as with the loyal students of the Music Center who were a considerable part of the large audience, and he was forced to rise from his seat attending Mrs. Coolidge in the front row and personally acknowledge the enthusiastic response his music has evoked. Mr. Lourie also sat adjacent to Mrs. Coolidge and he, too, in his turn, was forced by the audience and the graciousness of Mr. Speyer to share the cordial applause his music had called forth.

Ending Is Hilarious

The evening ended with one of the most hilarious movements ever seen on the Tanglewood grounds when Mr. Speyer led 17 men in Jacques Ibert's divertissement for 15 instruments. This is a suite of a half-dozen varied episodes entitled: "Cortege," "Nocturne," "Valse," "Parade," etc., and it is the best-sounding, wittiest, rip-snorting purely amusing piece of music that ever came down the pike. It is admittedly hokum, and the textual references to "the" wedding march, and something which must be the French equivalent of "Turkey in the Straw," and such things as Gallic Bronx cheers, had the audience in stitches. So much so, in fact, that the uncontrolled laughter, as at a farce, prevented us often from catching the next lines. Mr. Speyer and the musicians threw caution to the winds and just went off the deep end. After the sober essays of the first three numbers, this was like fireworks, and many of us cannot remember when we had such a good time.

The whole series has been remarkable by reason of the program due, mainly, to the artistry of Louis Speyer. There have been many novelties, some brand new, others just dusted off, but all arranged for the stimulation of the various audiences, and the spontaneous rising gesture shown in deference to Mrs. Coolidge at the conclusion of this final concert was a mark of genuine gratitude.

Pittsfield, Massachusetts. Wednesday, July 24, 19

At the Close of a Memorable Evening

Will Plouffe

Premieres are becoming the usual thing at Tanglewood. Last night's program at the concert-opera hall had a premiere and a "first performance in America." Figuring prominently in the evening's entertainment were, left to right: Arthur Lourie, composer of "Naissance de la Beaute," given its first performance in America last night by the Berkshire Chamber Orchestra; Louis Speyer, conductor; Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, who made the chamber music series possible; Valentina Vishnevska, soloist, and Aaron Copland, whose sextet for piano, two violins, viola, violoncello and clarinet opened last night's program.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 25 1946

Berkshire Festival

New Malipiero Work Is Given at Lenox

Special to the Herald Tribune

PITTSFIELD, Mass., July 24.—The music of G. Francesco Malipiero came back into focus last night when his new solo cantata, "Le Sette Allegresse d'Amore," was given its first performance in the last of a series of four chamber-music concerts presented at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation.

America has heard little of Malipiero in recent years. He sat out the war at his home in Asolo, near Venice, and suffered much at the hands of the Germans, who destroyed part of his estate. The war being over, he felt it was time to celebrate love once more; hence this new composition, which was completed quite recently and dedicated to Mrs. Coolidge.

The "Seven Joys of Love" described in Lorenzo de Medici's prose text are not, however, of the sternly spiritual variety. The text purports to have been written in Lorenzo's old age, and it deals with its subject in terms of a nostalgia and reminiscence which Malipiero has dissolved into music with magnificent effect.

Malipiero has always dealt superlatively with old Italian themes. He has a rare gift for evoking the spirit and color of the renaissance through his tuneful, modal music. But in this recent work something new has been added. For all its modality, and for all its bright, continuous weaving of inexhaustible melodious garlands in the accompaniment of the chamber orchestra, the declamation of the solo soprano goes back, not to such songs as Lorenzo himself composed, but to Puccini. It is for all the world like a figure of Madama Butterfly sculptured in graceful polychrome tile by Luca Della Robbia.

The concert also brought us the first American performance of "The Birth of Beauty," a cantata for solo soprano, twelve sopranos, clarinet, bassoon, harpischord and cymbals. By Arthur Lourie, this work, based upon poems by Jules Supervielle inspired by Botticelli's "Birth of Venus," is a study in the delectable and colorful.

The program opened with Aaron Copland's rarely played sextet for clarinet, string quartet and piano. This is an arrangement, made in 1937, of Copland's "Short Symphony" of 1933. (The transcription was made because the original version found no takers.)

The music is in Copland's most devastatingly dramatic, searing and serious vein; its rhythmic complexities raise one's hair, and its total effect raises one's spirits to a sense of the meaning and value of music vouchsafed by no other composer on this program. Malipiero, Lourie and Ibert, whose well known "Divertissement" closed the evening, write charmingly, amusingly and cleverly; Copland charges head on into the profoundest issues. Copland is in the great tradition.

One must also record superb performances by the Berkshire Chamber Orchestra, a group of Boston Symphony men led by Louis Speyer; by Valentina Vishnevska, the soprano soloist, and by members of the Berkshire Music Center Chorus.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 25 1946

Berkshire Festival Is Tonight at 8.15

The Berkshire Music festival starts tonight at 8.15 in Lenox with the Boston symphony orchestra pr[redacted]ican premiere of the new Ninth symphony by Shostakovich. No seats are left, but a few $2 tickets for the lawn are available. Evening concerts Thursdays and Saturdays for the next three weeks begin at 8.15, with Sunday afternoon concerts at 3.30. Lenox 530 has further information.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 25, 1946

Nature's Setting for Symphony

Ruth Orkin

The green turf at "Tanglewood," Lenox, Mass., is dotted these days with music students studying at the famed Berkshire Music Center, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the background is the Music Shed, where the first full-scale Berkshire Festival since the war will present performances of the Boston Symphony beginning tonight, on Saturday evening, July 27, and Sunday afternoon, July 28, continuing in the same pattern for the following two weeks. Up to this time this season, only part of the orchestra in chamber music has been heard.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 26 1946

Full Berkshire Music Festivals Are Resumed

Koussevitzky Conducts the U. S. Premiere of Ninth Shostakovitch Symphony

By Francis D. Perkins

LENOX, Mass., July 25.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra began the first full-scale Berkshire festival in five years tonight in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, where Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first American performance of Dmitri Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony opened the program, and Ravel's arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" followed the new Russian work.

With the natural interest in the resumption of this festival, after its war-time suspension, and the co-operation of the weather, which was clear and cool before the starting hour, the audience was large. As in previous summers the Musical Shed itself was filled, and many heard the music outdoors, standing, seated or reclining on the grass.

Officially, this the ninth Berkshire symphonic festival since this notable series began in 1934, or the tenth, if we count the memorable concerts given in 1942 by Dr. Koussevitzky with the Berkshire Music Center's student orchestra. It is the seventh festival to be given by the Boston Symphony, the eighth to be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, the seventh to be held at Tanglewood and the sixth to be held in the Music Shed. It also marks the culmination of the fourth season of the Berkshire Music Center, whose six-weeks session, with its many varieties of musical performances, can be regarded as a festival on an unusually extensive scale.

The war caused the suspension of the center's sessions and the festivals during the last three summers. But Dr. Koussevitzky and a small orchestra of Boston Symphony musicians presented a Mozart series in 1944 and a Bach and Mozart series in 1945. A similar series has been given this summer.

Critical comment on the new Shostakovitch symphony must be forgone until tomorrow. It was composed last August and first performed on Nov. 3 at Leningrad in a broadcast concert of the Moscow radio. Unlike Shostakovitch's seventh and eight symphonies, each of which are over an hour long—it is short, taking only about twenty-five minutes to play. The seventh and eighth symphonies were both inspired by the war. The composer planned to follow these with a victory symphony but has postponed the fulfillment of that idea.

Dr. Koussevitzky, warmly applauded on his first post-war public appearance upon this podium, began the concert without the prelude of a speech or other ceremonial. The first movement of the "Eroica" illustrated the well known, but still remarkable, high standards of performance of this distinguished orchestra and the inspiring leadership and musical insight of its eminent conductor. The attendance was nearly 8,000.

The parking field and approaches have been improved and paved, and traffic problems were handled smoothly.

6000 Jam Shed at Tanglewood Premier

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, July 25.—This afternoon the weatherman withdrew his threat of rain, which has drenched so many Tanglewood premiers, and tonight these beautifully spacious grounds were elegantly primed and resplendent for the music of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

This Berkshire festival opening was undoubtedly one of the most spectacular sights in the history of music festivals. The mammoth shed, with its openings on three sides, was jammed with over 6000 spectators.

Among them was a galaxy of world celebrities that kept the flash bulbs bursting and put the autograph hounds in a dither. There were Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Lady Berenson of New Zealand, Princess Toussoun of Egypt, Mrs. Joseph Kennedy, H. V. Kaltenborn, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Spalding, not to mention an awesome "Who's Who" of musicians.

At the last concert in 1941 more persons heard the music from the outlying grounds than from the shed.

This wasn't true tonight, but nevertheless the immense grounds were generously freckled with small groups who sat or reclined and were well able to hear the beautiful sound that swelled from the shed.

Given Great Ovation

Any "Doubting Thomas," harboring a suspicion that Dr. Koussevitzky has reached the stage of inefficient batonist, due to advancing years, would have been cured tonight of any such delusions. Never have I seen the veteran conductor demand results and imbue his style with more vitality. The ovation he was given when he stepped upon the platform was reminiscent of those accorded Paderewski in his last tours. The audience promptly stood and the applause was long and hearty.

The program's most discussed and anticipated work was "Symphony No. 9, Opus 70," by Shostakovich, which was given its first Western Hemisphere performance here tonight. Five years ago the same composer's "Symphony No. 7" was accorded the same honor. In the course of three-quarters of an hour, the "Seventh Symphony" ranted and shouted the discord and horror that was associated with the siege of Leningrad, that allegedly inspired the symphony.

Placid and Bucolic

Chaos and apprehension having been transferred from the battlefields to the conference table, the young Russian composer has written a placid, bucolic, amenable score (twenty-five minutes in length) that reflect how beautiful can be the rainbow after the storm. As a biography of world affairs, the "Ninth Symphony" speaks with reassurance, even disarmingly. When its political implications are entirely disassociated, it takes its place among the more interesting experimental contributions of the Twentieth Century.

It is naturally replete with Shostakovich technic-elusive melodic lines, harmonic backgrounds that sometimes recede to fourth cousins of their maternal keys, instrumental combinations that delight the receptive modernist, and abrupt changes of rhythm that allow no day-dreaming.

Audience Enthusiastic

Dr. Koussevitsky presented the new work with obvious geniality, the orchestra played it faithfully, and the audience responded enthusiastically.

The program opened with an impressive reading of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 3, in E-Flat Major, Opus 55." This was an excellent choice, for it modulated admirably from the more restrained Bach-Mozart fare that the war has exacted for the past two seasons in Tanglewood's small concert hall.

'Pictures at an Exhibition'

The program was brought to a close with Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." In bold and sparkling relief was the intriguing pilgrimage among the pictures. The gnomes, catacombs, chickens, oxcart, naughty children, and the witch all had their say, and finally the gates of Kiev were thrown open with the orchestra's full power.

The next concerts will be Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon with corresponding concerts on the two coming weekends. You may not be able to sit in the shed, but the grounds are spacious, and you can hear perfectly well.

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

JUL 26 1946

9TH SYMPHONY PLAYED AT BERKSHIRE CONCERT

LENOX, Mass., July 25—(AP) The first western hemisphere performance of the ninth symphony of the Russian composer, Dmitri Shostakovich, was played tonight as Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra resumed for the first time since the war the noted Berkshire symphonic festival.

The music shed on the "Tanglewood" estate, which is the home of the festival and summer mecca of international audiences, held nearly 8,000 persons as Dr. Koussevitzky began the first of a nine-concert series.

The new Shostakovich work—25 minutes long—was described by Dr. Koussevitzky as "notable for its brevity and cheerfulness."

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUL 26 1946

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Lenox, Mass., July 25.—(AP)—The first Western Hemisphere performance of the Ninth Symphony of the Russian composer, Dmitri Shostakovich, was played tonight as Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra resumed for the first time since the war the noted Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Berk. Eagle
July 25

8000 Expected For Reopening Of Festival

Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Ready For Gala Occasion

An estimated audience of 8000 from all parts of the world will gather to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, tonight at 8.15, in the concert that will reopen the Berkshire Festival, suspended because of war conditions since 1941.

With all seats in the Shed sold for nearly a month for this week end and next Saturday and Sunday, a large sale of grounds admission tickets is expected. Benches have been placed inside the colomade and to the west of the Shed, so that early-comers may sit. Others will listen from the lawn, where without amplification, the music can be heard because of the phenomenal acoustics of the Shed.

Rehearsals Open

Members of the orchestra who were not already here as members of the music center faculty arrived Tuesday. Many had played at the concerts on the Esplanade in Boston until they ended the season Sunday evening. Rehearsals for the Festival have been going on since their arrival, and will continue throughout the Festival season. The Saturday morning rehearsals at 10 will be open to the public at a nominal charge for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Special rates will be available to students and adults accompanied by four or more children.

The schedule of events open to members of the society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center this week end includes a lecture-recital on "Art Into Music" this afternoon at 4.30, illustrated by piano and lantern slides; a lecture tomorrow at 4.30 by Olin Downes on musical criticism; a concert Saturday at 2.30 by the choral department, directed by Robert Shaw; and a concert Sunday at 10.30 by Gregor Piatgorsky's chamber music group. The symphony concert by Department 2 orchestra scheduled for tomorrow evening will be postponed until Aug. 2.

The gardens and grounds have been groomed by a force under the direction of Ward J. Gaston, superintendent of the estate given to the orchestra eight years ago for its summer home. Realizing the need for proper provisions for parking, the orchestra trustees ordered this spring the installation of an additional lighting tower and two hard-surfaced roads, with an adequate drainage system.

Cars from the north will enter the grounds by the new road north of the main gate. Cars from the south will enter by the new road south of the main gate. Cars of boxholders should use the Hawthorne Street entrance, which leads to a special parking lot.

A volunteer crew of 150 local men and young women, under the direction of Willard M. Sistare, assisted by Fred T. Francis, will issue programs and serve as ushers. James W. Hull and Daniel Power will be in charge of boxes; Norman B. Hollister and Harry R. Birt of the front section; and C. G. Montgomery and Frank N. Atkin of the rear section. Miss Martha Hick and Miss Margaret Daniels will head the program section.

The grounds will be policed by officers from Lenox, Lee, Stockbridge and Pittsfield, directed by Bartholomew Barry, a special officer of Lenox. Cpl. Harry M. Keating of the Lee state police will head the policing of the highways.

Parties are invited to picnic on the grounds of the estate, which will open at 6. Busses will leave the park at 7.15 tonight and Saturday and 2.15 Sunday. There will be special bus service also from Lee, Stockbridge and Lenox.

The programs follow for the three concerts this week end:

This Evening
Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Eroica, Opus 55 .... Beethoven
Symphony No. 9 .... Shostakovitch
(First performance in America)
Pictures at an Exhibition .... Moussorgsky-Ravel

Saturday Evening
Symphony No. 6, Pastoral ... Beethoven
Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor, Opus 18 .... Rachmaninoff
Daphnis et Chloe, Ballet (Second Suite) .... Ravel Soloist—Eugene List

Sunday Afternoon
Symphony No. 4 in A major, Italian .... Mendelssohn
Suite From Appalachian Spring..Copland
Symphony No. 5, in E minor..Tchaikovsky

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN JULY 26, 1946

Boston Symphony Superb Before Capacity Audience

Notables Seen In Big Audience

Lenox, July 25 — A Lenox traffic jam prevented more than 2000 patrons from reaching the Tanglewood music shed on time tonight. A double line of cars reached from Tanglewood for four miles toward Pittsfield.

Tanglewood, Lenox, July 25 — After five years of war and postwar Tanglewood came back tonight as a music center in full swing. An audience of 8200 including Mrs Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Mrs Henry Morgenthau, Jr., heard the first of nine Berkshire Music festival concerts over three weekends by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The weather was perfect and there was a large overflow on the lawn from the music shed with its 6500 seats, all of which have been repainted since the last concert by the full orchestra was held there in 1941.

Parking facilities have been enlarged and greatly improved under the direction of Ward J. Gaston, who has been superintendent of the estate for 16 years. Two hard-surfaced roads have been constructed and a new lighting tower installed. Lieut Michael J. Noonan of Northampton assisted by Corp Joseph A. Keating of Lee was in command of a detail of 12 state police from Lee, Pittsfield, Russell and Monson on Lenox and Stockbridge highways leading to Tanglewood. The grounds were policed by 16 men in uniform under Special Officer Bartholomew W. Barry of the Lenox town force.

Willard M. Sistare, Pittsfield, chief usher, assisted by Fred T. Francis, had a force of 150 volunteer Pittsfield men and women. In charge of various sections were Daniel Power, James W. Hull, Misses Martha E. Hick and Margaret Daniels, Harry R. Birt, Norman B. Hollister, Frank N. Atkin and C. G. Montgomery. All boxes and seats for the first three concerts, the second and third of which will be given Saturday night at 8.15 and Sunday afternoon at 3.30 have been sold weeks in advance.

In a box tonight with Mr and Mrs John Shepard, Jr., were Prince and Princess Ladislas Sapieha, formerly of Warsaw, and her mother, Baroness Louise Bornemisza.

Baroness Humbert de Viry of Shipton court, Lenox, was accompanied by her mother, Countess Max de Foras and sister, Mlle Huguette de Foras of Chateau de Thuyset, Thonon-les-Bains, France. Mr and Mrs Woodbridge Strong (Joumine de Viry) also were with them.

Princess Eugenia Ruspoli, formerly of Castello di Nemi, Rome, was accompanied by her son-in-law and daughter, Prince and Princess Alexis Droutzkoy of Rome, who are at Curtis hotel for the festival.

With Mrs George Otis Rockwood of Laurel Mere, Stockbridge, were her daughter, Princess Diane R. Eristavi and a group of friends.

Mr and Mrs Bruce Crane of Dalton had as box guests her brother-in-law and sister, Mr and Mrs Pomeroy Day of Hartford and Anis Fuleihan, a Greek composer who is at the Pittsfield Music school.

In the party of Mrs Edward A. Jones of Pittsfield were Rev and Mrs John Gratton and family of that city.

Mr and Mrs Basil de Selincourt of London and Dr and Mrs Rutin McIntosh, New York, were box guests of Dr and Mrs Walter W. Palmer of New York and Tyringham.

In a box with Miss Anna Remsen Alexandre and her sister, Mrs Alexandre Hoppin were Mr and Mrs George K. Livermore and Mrs Ralph Pulitzer.

Lowell Thomas, the radio commentator and Mrs Thomas were with Mr and Mrs James J. Joyce, who had a cocktail party for them at the Berkshire inn, Great Barrington. Among others staying at the inn and attending the concert were Mr and Mrs E. V. Johnson, Springfield; Mrs Frederick A. Gier, Cincinnati; Mrs Frederick Wead Drury and Miss Frances S. Drury, New York.

In a box with Mr and Mrs Lester Roberts of Curtis hotel, Lenox, were Mrs Henry White Cannon and her guest, Miss Elizabeth Atwood.

In a box with Mr and Mrs Robert K. Wheeler, Great Barrington, as guest were Rev and Mrs Richard Mortimer-Maddox and Mr and Mrs Frank Beattie.

In the group from the Curtis patrons were Mrs Frederick S. Coolidge, founder of the South Mountain Music colony, Pittsfield; Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Corp. and Mrs Cabot; Mr and Mrs Henry W. Sawyer of Boston, E. Panteado, attache of the Brazilian legation at Washington and Mrs Penteado; Mrs Lucy Wadhams Dodge, Mrs Charles E. Mitchell, Mrs E. Griswold Hollister and her sister, Miss Olive C. Colton, Mrs Jennings Hackett and Coleman Jennings and Mr and Mrs Olin Downes.

From the Lenox club were Mr and Mrs James Dwight Francis of Santa Barbara, Cal., formerly of Pittsfield; Mr and Mrs Edward A. Taft, Mr and Mrs Thomas N. Metcalf, Boston; Mr and Mrs Charles A. Cass, New York; Mr and Mrs Royal Little, Providence, R. I.

Box guests of Mrs Caroline Davie Lloyd of Fencefields, Lee, were Canon Glyn Thomas and Mrs Thomas and Mrs Charles Lewis of Kinderhook, N. Y.; Mr and Mrs Bruce W. Sanborn of St Paul, Minn., and Mrs James Wilkinson of New Orleans.

Members of the Stokes family noticed were Canon and Mrs Anson Phelps Stokes, their son and daughter-in-law, Mr and Mrs I. Newton Phelps Stokes of Washington and Mr and Mrs William E. Dodge Stokes. Others were Mr and Mrs Heaton Ives Treadway of Stockbridge, Prof and Mrs Philip Marshall Brown of South Williamstown, Mr and Mrs Walter Hoving, Mr and Mrs Winthrop M. Crane, Jr., Mr and Mrs John Nicholas Brown.

In a box with Mr and Mrs William Felton Barrett were Miss Katherine Bixby of Lake George and Lieut William F. Barrett, Jr., USA.

8200 Thrilled At Tanglewood

By VICTOR PRAHL

Tanglewood, Lenox, July 25—Back in the large concert shed for the first time in five years, the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky opened the Berkshire festival season tonight in a blaze of glory before a capacity audience of 8200 which included many prominent personalities. All seats in the auditorium had been sold for some time. Hundreds filled the open spaces at the sides and back.

The orchestra opened appropriately with Beethoven's "Eroica." It is doubtful whether this symphony with which the composer entered a brave new world has ever glowed forth more brilliantly in its elemental qualities of nobility and grandeur. From the flowing breadth of the opening phrases of the "Allegro con brio" to the final thrilling "Presto" the audience was held spellbound.

Dr Koussevitzky's interpretation of this familiar opus is too well known to need any further detailed analysis. Suffice it to mention a few parts which seemed to shine forth anew, such as the poignant melody of the "Marcia Funebre" with its delicate instrumentation, the refined precision of the "Scherzo" and the subtle poetry and sudden changes of mood in the last movement. At its conclusion Dr Koussevitzky was accorded an even greater ovation than when he entered the platform. It was a thrilling performance.

As wonderful as this was, it was obvious that the interest of the audience centered in the first performance in this country of Shostakovitch's "Ninth Symphony." After his other efforts in the symphonic form, this new work represents a return to simplicity and for the most part is easy to listen to at a first hearing. In general it is more highly concentrated than the others, the first movement following the conventional lines of the sonata form, the second contrasting in its lyricism, and in this case an improvement over his previous melodic invention, and a gay scherzo. The fourth movement serves mainly as an interlude leading up to the finale, by far the best part of the symphony. Using the resources of the full orchestra the composer resorts to all of his best tricks, long familiar to his admirers, and with his usual success. It is vibrantly gay and lively, tumultuously noisy and musically brilliant in the Russian manner. The audience loved it, applauding wildly, demanding the return of Dr Koussevitzky to the podium repeatedly.

The program closed with Maurice Ravel's masterly orchestration of Moussorgsky's set of piano pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition."

This Clipping From BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
JUL 26 1946

9TH SYMPHONY PLAYED AT BERKSHIRE CONCERT

LENOX, Mass., July 26.—(AP) The first western hemisphere performance of the ninth symphony of the Russian composer, Dmitri Shostakovich, was played last night as Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra resumed for the first time since the war the noted Berkshire symphonic festival.

The music shed on the "Tanglewood" estate, which is the home of the festival and summer mecca of international audiences, held nearly 8,000 persons as Dr. Koussevitzky began the first of a nine-concert series.

The new Shostakovich work—25 minutes long—was described by Dr Koussevitzky as "notable for its brevity and cheerfulness."

BOSTON HERALD

TANGLEWOOD THRONG HEARS SHOSTAKOVITCH

[Staff Correspondent to The Herald]

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, July 25—With perfect weather for the first time in five years, the Berkshire Music Festival returned tonight in full measure. Closed during the war years, the music shed with seating capacity of 6500 persons had been sold out weeks in advance and there was a large overflow audience estimated at 3000 to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in the first American performance of the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 9.

Tonight's concert was the first of nine to be given over three weekends. The great shed with all seats has been newly painted; Grounds and gardens were bright green after heavy spring rains and July showers and everything was spic and span, made so by Estate Supt. Ward J. Gaston.

Within the past few months the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president, has deeded over the music shed, built by popular subscription at a cost of $80,000, to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Parking areas and illumination have been enlarged and improved. Extra state police under Lt. Michael J. Noonan of Northampton and uniformed officers on the grounds were in charge of traffic.

It was one of those gala nights for which the Berkshire Music Festival became famous in the pre-war days after Tanglewood was deeded over to the Boston Symphony by Mrs. Andrew Hopewell Hepburn of Concord and her aunt, the late Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan of Boston. Mrs. Hepburn is to be here for the second and third series.

(Continued on Page Ten)

MRS. ROOSEVELT PRESENT

Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., were in the audience. In a box with Mr. and Mrs. John Shepard, Jr., were Prince and Princess Ladislas Sapieha and her mother, Baroness Louise Bornemixza.

Baroness Humbert de Viry of Shipton court, Lenox, was accompanied by her mother, Countess Max de Foras and Sister Mlle. Huguette de Foras of Chateau de Thuyset, Thonon-les-Bains, France. Mr. and Mrs. Woodbridge Strong (Joumine de Viry) also were with them.

Princess Eugenia Ruspoli, formerly of Castello di Nemi, Rome, was accompanied by her son-in-law and daughter, Prince and Princess Alexis Droutzkoy of Rome, who are at Crutis Hotel for the festival.

With Mrs. George Otis Rockwood of Laurel Mere, Stockbridge, was her daughter, Princess Diane R. Eristavi.

GREEK COMPOSER ATTENDS

Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Crane had as box guests her brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. Pomeroy Day of Hartford, and Anis Fuleihan, a Greek composer who is at the Pittsfield Music School.

Mr. and Mrs. Basil de Selincourt of London and Dr. and Mrs. Rustin McIntosh, New York, were box guests of Dr. and Mrs. Walter W. Palmer of New York and Tyringham.

In a box with Miss Anna Remsen Alexandre and her sister, Mrs. Alexandre Hoppin, were Mr. and Mrs. George K. Livermore and Mrs. Ralph Pulitzer.

OTHER NOTABLES

In the group from the Curtis Hotel were Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, founder of the South Mountain Music Colony, Pittsfield; Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Corporation and Mrs. Cabot: Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Sawyer of Boston; E. Panteado, attache of the Brazilian Embassy at Washington and Mrs. Penteado; Mrs. Lucy Washams Dodge, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell, Mrs. E. Griswold Hollister and her sister, Miss Olive C. Colton; Mrs. Jennings Hackett, Coleman Jennings, and Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes.

From the Lenox Club were Mr. and Mrs. James Dwight Francis of Santa Barbara, Calif., formerly of Pittsfield; Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas N. Metcalf. Boston; Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Cass, New York, and Mr. and Mrs. Royal Little, Providence.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JUL 26 1946

8,000 AT PREMIERE OF BERKSHIRE FETE

First American Performance of Shostakovich's Ninth Marks Opening of Annual Festival

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 25—An audience of eight thousand and the American première of Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony were distinguishing features of the opening concert of the ninth Berkshire Festival given this evening by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the music shed at Tanglewood.

Shostakovich's work, which is short and generally of slighter material than any of his earlier works in the great form, was preceded by the "Eroica" of Beethoven and followed by the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures From an Exhibition." The music of Beethoven, nobly conveyed, was welcomed with the emotion of an audience deeply moved by its message.

It has been five years since the interpreting orchestra and conductor has been heard together here. In that interval a tortured world has greatly changed. But the eternal verities of the symphony had not changed, and events of intervening years had only served to emphasize its significance.

Work Is Prevailingly Gay

It is not the general custom to wait for the second half of a program for one initial presentation of a new score, but it was doubtless the special content of the "Eroica" which caused Koussevitzky to feel its appositeness to the occasion. And it must be said, with no reproach intended, that Shostakovich's latest symphony is in no similar vein. It is prevailingly gay and sometimes parodistic in tone. Written with this composer's customary swiftness and facility in the single month of August of last year, it makes no pretenses to the epic or oracular vein of the Seventh and Eighth Symphonies which immediately preceded it. The form is classic, the orchestra almost so in its proportions. A more romantic mood is provided by the lyrical second movement.

Perhaps the most unusual procedure is encountered in the short movement, a dialogue between a solo bassoon and lower brass instruments, that serves as an interlude between the third and last parts.

The work was well received. Its further discussion, however, must be reserved for a later occasion.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JUL 26 1946

Berkshire Music Festival Opens

Lenox, Mass., July 26.—(AP)—An audience of nearly 8000 persons greeted warmly the first Western Hemisphere performance of Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony, played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Russian composer's Ninth Symphony was the first of a nine-concert series—the first post-war Berkshire Symphonic Festival—by Dr. Koussevitzky at the "Tanglewood" estate, home of the Festival and Summer mecca of international audiences.

The new Shostakovich work, light and gay throughout with a few pensive but not tragic moments, lasted a little more than 20 minutes as compared to the hour-long and war-clouded Seventh and Eighth symphonies of the Soviet composer.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JUL 26 1946

SHOSTAKOVITCH NINTH IS HEARD

Koussevitzky Presents Its American Premiere.

By IRVING KOLODIN.
Special to THE NEW YORK SUN.

Lenox, Mass., July 26.—Serge Koussevitzky advanced two of the interests closest to his heart as the ninth annual Berkshire festival began at Tanglewood here last night. One, of course, was the cause of music generally, the other, such contribution to Soviet-American amity as ca accomplished by 100 music operating without a veto po This he accomplished by pres ing the first performance America of Dimitri Shosta vitch's Ninth Symphony, the est of the prolific Russian's jor works.

Shostakovitch has been quo as saying: "It is a merry lit piece. Musicians will love to p it and critics will delight in bla ing it."

Statement True.

Everything about this sta ment is true, except the fi phrase (so far as it applies to t listener). This product of t immediate post-war period was completed last August) is plain in its intent, and so entire successful in achieving it, that can be indorsed without questi as a thoroughly likable wo which is likely to usurp the pop larity previously enjoyed by h first symphony.

The real Shostakovitch in fac t is quite likely to be regarde by those who considered his se nth and eighth symphonies co scious and labored efforts to pa llel in music the life and deat struggle of the Russian people war, as a resurgence of the "real Shostakovitch, the witty, inge ous, thoroughly professiona craftsman, amusing himself an us with the racy play of hi thoughts. Certainly it has closer relationship to the firs and fifth symphonies than eithe the seventh or the eig had.

Rousing Applau

It can even be said t it fu fills triumphantly the first tes of a durable symphony and i could go into the ballet repertory tomorrow. There will be ampl opportunity to elaborate on it qualities at the inevitable per formances to come for it con tains a multiplicity of the qual ities—ironic, lyric, cheerful and sombre—that conductors dote on The first listeners punctuated each pause with an approving patter, and rewarded the per formers with rousing applause a the end.

Many in the audience of more than 8,000 made for waiting cars and buses without waiting to hear the playing of Moussorg sky's "Pictures At an Exposition, which concluded the program for the evening was lively with a breeze that made the open shed slightly less than comfortable. As a memorial, perhaps, to another war, Koussevitzky began the fes tival with a playing of Beetho ven's "Eroica" symphony, in which the splendid orchestra worked its accustomed miracles

---

Editorials

Koussevitzky A Decade

Dr. Kouss he first cam had come more with adventure he played canvas at Holmwood, on the Lenox-Lee roa vitzky is 72.

One's friends are days by special obser of the passage of a lifetime. Men them passage of a decade a decade in a career sciousness with the resumption phonic Festivals after years, Koussevitzky fully back on a deca has as strong overton triumph as has ever creative artist.

It has been an wartime lapse makes higher relief. Quite strides in the ten year of musical enterprise glewood, the bulked of that decade could regular patrons who enterprise from its returned last night sence. There it was, with its sea of faces broad hayfield, the finitely greater becau tiered galleries. The same as before, faced genius. The gardens closely barbered; the in the clear, cool nigh ber of unobtrusive buildings housing thriving school; the graded, drained, ligh neat yet not detracti pervading greenery. ple, of all kinds and bitious, the import scious and unconscio ticates, the uncritical were again, the same most of them a li spectacle of their ow enjoying themselves standings of the Pushing, crowding living, beautiful, Ten years have pa is 72. Before him apparatus of a matched by noth else in the world. What other way

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN JULY 26, 1946 BOSTON HERALD

Boston Symphony Superb Before Capacity Audience

Notables Seen In Big Audience

Lenox, July 25 — A Lenox traffic jam prevented more than 2000 patrons from reaching the Tanglewood music shed on time tonight. A double line of cars reached from Tanglewood for four miles toward Pittsfield.

Tanglewood, Lenox, July 25 — After five years of war and postwar Tanglewood came back tonight as a music center in full swing. An audience of 8200 including Mrs Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Mrs Henry Morgenthau, Jr., heard the first of nine Berkshire Music festival concerts over three weekends by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The weather was perfect and there was a large overflow on the lawn from the music shed with its 6500 seats, all of which have been repainted since the last concert by the full orchestra was held there in 1941.

Parking facilities have been enlarged and greatly improved under the direction of Ward J. Gaston, who has been superintendent of the estate for 16 years. Two hard-surfaced roads have been constructed and a new lighting tower installed. Lieut Michael J. Noonan of Northampton assisted by Corp Joseph A. Keating of Lee was in command of a detail of 12 state police from Lee, Pittsfield, Russell and Monson on Lenox and Stockbridge highways leading to Tanglewood. The grounds were policed by 16 men in uniform under Special Officer Bartholomew W. Barry of the Lenox town force.

Willard M. Sistare, Pittsfield, chief usher, assisted by Fred T. Francis, had a force of 150 volunteer Pittsfield men and women. In charge of various sections were Daniel Power, James W. Hull, Misses Martha E. Hick and Margaret Daniels, Harry R. Birt, Norman B. Hollister, Frank N. Atkin and C. G. Montgomery. All boxes and seats for the first three concerts, the second and third of which will be given Saturday night at 8.15 and Sunday afternoon at 3.30 have been sold weeks in advance.

In a box tonight with Mr and Mrs John Shepard, Jr., were Prince and Princess Ladislas Sapieha, formerly of Warsaw, and her mother, Baroness Louise Bornemisza.

Baroness Humbert de Viry of Shipton court, Lenox, was accompanied by her mother, Countess Max de Foras and sister, Mlle Huguette de Foras of Chateau de Thuyset, Thonon-les-Bains, France. Mr and Mrs Woodbridge Strong (Joumine de Viry) also were with them.

Princess Eugenia Ruspoli, formerly of Castello di Nemi, Rome, was accompanied by her son-in-law and daughter, Prince and Princess Alexis Droutzkoy of Rome, who are at Curtis hotel for the festival.

With Mrs George Otis Rockwood of Laurel Mere, Stockbridge, were her daughter, Princess Diane R. Eristavi and a group of friends.

Mr and Mrs Bruce Crane of Dalton had as box guests her brother-in-law and sister, Mr and Mrs Pomeroy Day of Hartford and Anis Fuleihan, a Greek composer who is at the Pittsfield Music school.

In the party of Mrs Edward A. Jones of Pittsfield were Rev and Mrs John Gratton and family of that city.

Mr and Mrs Basil de Selincourt of London and Dr and Mrs Rutin McIntosh, New York, were box guests of Dr and Mrs Walter W. Palmer of New York and Tyringham.

In a box with Miss Anna Remsen Alexandre and her sister, Mrs Alexandre Hoppin were Mr and Mrs George K. Livermore and Mrs Ralph Pulitzer.

Lowell Thomas, the radio commentator and Mrs Thomas were with Mr and Mrs James J. Joyce, who had a cocktail party for them at the Berkshire inn, Great Barrington. Among others staying at the inn and attending the concert were Mr and Mrs E. V. Johnson, Springfield; Mrs Frederick A. Gier, Cincinnati; Mrs Frederick Wead Drury and Miss Frances S. Drury, New York.

In a box with Mr and Mrs Lester Roberts of Curtis hotel, Lenox, were Mrs Henry White Cannon and her guest, Miss Elizabeth Atwood.

In a box with Mr and Mrs Robert K. Wheeler, Great Barrington, as guest were Rev and Mrs Richard Mortimer-Maddox and Mr and Mrs Frank Beattie.

In the group from the Curtis patrons were Mrs Frederick S. Coolidge, founder of the South Mountain Music colony, Pittsfield; Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Corp. and Mrs Cabot; Mr and Mrs Henry W. Sawyer of Boston, E. Panteado, attache of the Brazilian legation at Washington and Mrs Penteado; Mrs Lucy Wadhams Dodge, Mrs Charles E. Mitchell, Mrs E. Griswold Hollister and her sister, Miss Olive C. Colton, Mrs Jennings Hackett and Coleman Jennings and Mr and Mrs Olin Downes.

From the Lenox club were Mr and Mrs James Dwight Francis of Santa Barbara, Cal., formerly of Pittsfield; Mr and Mrs Edward A. Taft, Mr and Mrs Thomas N. Metcalf, Boston; Mr and Mrs Charles A. Cass, New York; Mr and Mrs Royal Little, Providence, R. I.

8200 Thrilled At Tanglewood

By VICTOR PRAHL

Tanglewood, Lenox, July 25—Back in the large concert shed for the first time in five years, the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky opened the Berkshire festival season tonight in a blaze of glory before a capacity audience of 8200 which included many prominent personalities. All seats in the auditorium had been sold for some time. Hundreds filled the open spaces at the sides and back.

The orchestra opened appropriately with Beethoven's "Eroica." It is doubtful whether this symphony with which the composer entered a brave new world has ever glowed forth more brilliantly in its elemental qualities of nobility and grandeur. From the flowing breadth of the opening phrases of the "Allegro con brio" to the final thrilling "Presto" the audience was held spellbound.

Dr Koussevitzky's interpretation of this familiar opus is too well known to need any further detailed analysis. Suffice it to mention a few parts which seemed to shine forth anew, such as the poignant melody of the "Marcia Funebre" with its delicate instrumentation, the refined precision of the "Scherzo" and the subtle poetry and sudden changes of mood in the last movement. At its conclusion Dr Koussevitzky was accorded an even greater ovation than when he entered the platform. It was a thrilling performance.

As wonderful as this was, it was obvious that the interest of the audience centered in the first performance in this country of Shostakovitch's "Ninth Symphony." After his other efforts in the symphonic form, this new work represents a return to simplicity and for the most part is easy to listen to at a first hearing. In general it is more highly concentrated than the others, the first movement following the conventional lines of the sonata form, the second contrasting in its lyricism, and in this case an improvement over his previous melodic invention, and a gay scherzo. The fourth movement serves mainly as an interlude leading up to the finale, by far the best part of the symphony. Using the resources of the full orchestra the composer resorts to all of his best tricks, long familiar to his admirers, and with his usual success. It is vibrantly gay and lively, tumultuously noisy and musically brilliant in the Russian manner. The audience loved it, applauding wildly, demanding the return of Dr Koussevitzky to the podium repeatedly.

The program closed with Maurice Ravel's masterly orchestration of Moussorgsky's set of piano pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition."

This Clipping From BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
JUL 26 1946

9TH SYMPHONY PLAYED AT BERKSHIRE CONCERT

LENOX, Mass., July 26.—(AP) The first western hemisphere performance of the ninth symphony of the Russian composer, Dmitri Shostakovich, was played last night as Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra resumed for the first time since the war the noted Berkshire symphonic festival.

The music shed on the "Tanglewood" estate, which is the home of the festival and summer mecca of international audiences, held nearly 8,000 persons as Dr. Koussevitzky began the first of a nine-concert series.

The new Shostakovich work—25 minutes long—was described by Dr Koussevitzky as "notable for its brevity and cheerfulness."

Box guests of Mrs Caroline Davie Lloyd of Fencefields, Lee, were Canon Glyn Thomas and Mrs Thomas and Mrs Charles Lewis of Kinderhook, N. Y.; Mr and Mrs Bruce W. Sanborn of St Paul, Minn., and Mrs James Wilkinson of New Orleans.

Members of the Stokes family noticed were Canon and Mrs Anson Phelps Stokes, their son and daughter-in-law, Mr and Mrs I. Newton Phelps Stokes of Washington and Mr and Mrs William E. Dodge Stokes. Others were Mr and Mrs Heaton Ives Treadway of Stockbridge, Prof and Mrs Philip Marshall Brown of South Williamstown, Mr and Mrs Walter Hoving, Mr and Mrs Winthrop M. Crane, Jr., Mr and Mrs John Nicholas Brown.

In a box with Mr and Mrs William Felton Barrett were Miss Katherine Bixby of Lake George and Lieut William F. Barrett, Jr., USA.

TANGLEWOOD THRONG HEARS SHOSTAKOVITCH

[Staff Correspondent to The Herald]

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, July 25—With perfect weather for the first time in five years, the Berkshire Music Festival returned tonight in full measure. Closed during the war years, the music shed with seating capacity of 6500 persons had been sold out weeks in advance and there was a large overflow audience estimated at 3000 to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in the first American performance of the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 9.

Tonight's concert was the first of nine to be given over three weekends. The great shed with all seats has been newly painted; Grounds and gardens were bright green after heavy spring rains and July showers and everything was spic and span, made so by Estate Supt. Ward J. Gaston.

Within the past few months the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president, has deeded over the music shed, built by popular subscription at a cost of $80,000, to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Parking areas and illumination have been enlarged and improved. Extra state police under Lt. Michael J. Noonan of Northampton and uniformed officers on the grounds were in charge of traffic.

It was one of those gala nights for which the Berkshire Music Festival became famous in the pre-war days after Tanglewood was deeded over to the Boston Symphony by Mrs. Andrew Hopewell Hepburn of Concord and her aunt, the late Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan of Boston. Mrs. Hepburn is to be here for the second and third series.

(Continued on Page Ten)

MRS. ROOSEVELT PRESENT

Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., were in the audience. In a box with Mr. and Mrs. John Shepard, Jr., were Prince and Princess Ladislas Sapieha and her mother, Baroness Louise Bornemixza.

Baroness Humbert de Viry of Shipton court, Lenox, was accompanied by her mother, Countess Max de Foras and Sister Mlle. Huguette de Foras of Chateau de Thuyset, Thonon-les-Bains, France. Mr. and Mrs. Woodbridge Strong (Joumine de Viry) also were with them.

Princess Eugenia Ruspoli, formerly of Castello di Nemi, Rome, was accompanied by her son-in-law and daughter, Prince and Princess Alexis Droutzkoy of Rome, who are at Crutis Hotel for the festival.

With Mrs. George Otis Rockwood of Laurel Mere, Stockbridge, was her daughter, Princess Diane R. Eristavi.

GREEK COMPOSER ATTENDS

Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Crane had as box guests her brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. Pomeroy Day of Hartford, and Anis Fuleihan, a Greek composer who is at the Pittsfield Music School.

Mr. and Mrs. Basil de Selincourt of London and Dr. and Mrs. Rustin McIntosh, New York, were box guests of Dr. and Mrs. Walter W. Palmer of New York and Tyringham.

In a box with Miss Anna Remsen Alexandre and her sister, Mrs. Alexandre Hoppin, were Mr. and Mrs. George K. Livermore and Mrs. Ralph Pulitzer.

OTHER NOTABLES

In the group from the Curtis Hotel were Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, founder of the South Mountain Music Colony, Pittsfield; Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Corporation and Mrs. Cabot; Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Sawyer of Boston; E. Panteado, attache of the Brazilian Embassy at Washington and Mrs. Penteado; Mrs. Lucy Washams Dodge, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell, Mrs. E. Griswold Hollister and her sister, Miss Olive C. Colton; Mrs. Jennings Hackett, Coleman Jennings, and Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes.

From the Lenox Club were Mr. and Mrs. James Dwight Francis of Santa Barbara, Calif., formerly of Pittsfield; Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas N. Metcalf. Boston; Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Cass, New York, and Mr. and Mrs. Royal Little, Providence.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUL 26 1946

8,000 AT PREMIERE OF BERKSHIRE FETE

First American Performance of Shostakovich's Ninth Marks Opening of Annual Festival

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 25—An audience of eight thousand and the American première of Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony were distinguishing features of the opening concert of the ninth Berkshire Festival given this evening by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the music shed at Tanglewood.

Shostakovich's work, which is short and generally of slighter material than any of his earlier works in the great form, was preceded by the "Eroica" of Beethoven and followed by the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures From an Exhibition." The music of Beethoven, nobly conveyed, was welcomed with the emotion of an audience deeply moved by its message.

It has been five years since the interpreting orchestra and conductor has been heard together here. In that interval a tortured world has greatly changed. But the eternal verities of the symphony had not changed, and events of intervening years had only served to emphasize its significance.

Work Is Prevailingly Gay

It is not the general custom to wait for the second half of a program for one initial presentation of a new score, but it was doubtless the special content of the "Eroica" which caused Koussevitzky to feel its appositeness to the occasion. And it must be said, with no reproach intended, that Shostakovich's latest symphony is in no similar vein. It is prevailingly gay and sometimes parodistic in tone. Written with this composer's customary swiftness and facility in the single month of August of last year, it makes no pretenses to the epic or oracular vein of the Seventh and Eighth Symphonies which immediately preceded it. The form is classic, the orchestra almost so in its proportions. A more romantic mood is provided by the lyrical second movement.

Perhaps the most unusual procedure is encountered in the short movement, a dialogue between a solo bassoon and lower [illegible] instruments, that serves as an interlude between the third and last parts.

The work was well received. Its further discussion, however, must be reserved for a later occasion.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JUL 26 1946

Berkshire Music Festival Opens

Lenox, Mass., July 26.—(AP)—An audience of nearly 8000 persons greeted warmly the first Western Hemisphere performance of Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony, played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Russian composer's Ninth Symphony was the first of a nine-concert series—the first post-war Berkshire Symphonic Festival—by Dr. Koussevitzky at the "Tanglewood" estate, home of the Festival and Summer mecca of international audiences.

The new Shostakovich work, light and gay throughout with a few pensive but not tragic moments, lasted a little more than 20 minutes as compared to the hour-long and war-clouded Seventh and Eighth symphonies of the Soviet composer.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JUL 26 1946

SHOSTAKOVITCH NINTH IS HEARD

Koussevitzky Presents Its American Premiere.

By IRVING KOLODIN.
Special to THE NEW YORK SUN.

Lenox, Mass., July 26.—Serge Koussevitzky advanced two of the interests closest to his heart as the ninth annual Berkshire festival began at Tanglewood here last night. One, of course, was the cause of music generally, the other, such contribution to Soviet-American amity as can be accomplished by 100 musicians operating without a veto power. This he accomplished by presenting the first performance in America of Dimitri Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony, the latest of the prolific Russian's major works.

Shostakovitch has been quoted as saying: "It is a merry little piece. Musicians will love to play it and critics will delight in blasting it."

Statement True.

Everything about this statement is true, except the final phrase (so far as it applies to this listener). This product of the immediate post-war period (it was completed last August) is so plain in its intent, and so entirely successful in achieving it, that it can be indorsed without question as a thoroughly likable work which is likely to usurp the popularity previously enjoyed by his first symphony.

The real Shostakovitch in fact, it is quite likely to be regarded, by those who considered his seventh and eighth symphonies conscious and labored efforts to parallel in music the life and death struggle of the Russian people at war, as a resurgence of the "real" Shostakovitch, the witty, ingenious, thoroughly professional craftsman, amusing himself and us with the racy play of his thoughts. Certainly it has a closer relationship to the first and fifth symphonies than either the seventh or the eighth had.

Rousing Applause.

It can even be said that it fulfills triumphantly the first test of a durable symphony and it could go into the ballet repertory tomorrow. There will be ample opportunity to elaborate on its qualities at the inevitable performances to come for it contains a multiplicity of the qualities—ironic, lyric, cheerful and sombre—that conductors dote on. The first listeners punctuated each pause with an approving patter, and rewarded the performers with rousing applause at the end.

Many in the audience of more than 8,000 made for waiting cars and buses without waiting to hear the playing of Moussorgsky's "Pictures At an Exposition," which concluded the program, for the evening was lively with a breeze that made the open shed slightly less than comfortable. As a memorial, perhaps, to another war, Koussevitzky began the festival with a playing of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, in which the splendid orchestra worked its accustomed miracles.

THE BERKSHIRE EVENING EAGLE JULY 26, 1946

FRITZ REINERS ATTEND: Among interested concert patrons was the conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony and his wife.

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVEN OVATION: The Boston Symphony leader acknowledges t thunderous applause at the conclusion of the concert. At the left is Richard Burgin, concertmaste

Editorials

Koussevitzky at 72:
A Decade of Triumph

Dr. Koussevitzky had just turned 62 when he first came to Berkshire 10 years ago. He had come with his orchestra, we daresay, more with a spirit of curiosity and spritely adventure than consuming ambition when he played three week-end concerts under canvas at Holmwood, an unoccupied estate on the Lenox-Lee road. Today Dr. Koussevitzky is 72.

One's friends are apt to signalize birthdays by special observance on the occasion of the passage of a decade in respect to a lifetime. Men themselves recognize the passage of a decade but more in respect to a decade in a career rather than a consciousness of the round number. Today, with the resumption of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals after a lapse of four war years, Koussevitzky quietly is looking pridefully back on a decade in a career which has as strong overtones of personal artistic triumph as has ever been enjoyed by any creative artist.

It has been an amazing ten years. The wartime lapse makes it stand out in even higher relief. Quite aside from the artistic strides in the ten years and the new facets of musical enterprise which gleam at Tanglewood, the bulked physical manifestations of that decade could not be lost on the regular patrons who have lived with the enterprise from its early days and who returned last night after a four-year absence. There it was, the huge, trussed shed with its sea of faces spreading out like a broad hayfield, the number seeming infinitely greater because of the absence of tiered galleries. The orchestra, much the same as before, faced by its small, driving genius. The gardens never greener or more closely barbered; the lake quiet and crisp in the clear, cool night; the mounting number of unobtrusive but substantial outbuildings housing the mechanism of a thriving school; the acres of parking area, graded, drained, lighted, and while tidy and neat yet not detracting overly from the pervading greenery. The pageantry of people, of all kinds and descriptions—the ambitious, the important, the socially conscious and unconscious, the musical sophisticates, the uncritical engrossed—there they were again, the same as before, some bored, most of them a little breathless at the spectacle of their own creation, all of them enjoying themselves in their separate understandings of the term.

Pushing, crowding, confusion, yes; but living, beautiful, dynamic and creative, too.. Ten years have passed. Today Koussevitzky is 72. Before him is a vast, throbbing apparatus of a musical dream come true, matched by nothing quite like it anywhere else in the world. Time does not stand still. What other way would we have it?

8000 Attend Reopening Of Festival

Throng Greets Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra

Mr. Jay C. Rosenfeld's review of the concert will be found on Page 6.

Last night 105 Americans who were born in 12 different countries, led by a native Russian, played the music of a German under a canopy of steel and timber designed by a Finn, and thus was reborn the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Shed Filled

Not since the summer of 1941 had the Boston Symphony Orchestra played from the stage of the huge Shed at Tanglewood. Not since that summer had the 6004 seats within the Shed been filled with people, the surrounding lawns dotted with listeners on blankets. And not since the summer of 1939 had 8000 people come to Tanglewood reasonably certain that this will happen again two days from now, and next week, and next year.

A clear night, with scattered clouds and a breeze from the west that freshened to the point of chill, greeted the opening night audience, which started arriving by foot, bicycle and car shortly after 7. A traffic jam along West Street to Lenox and northward toward Pittsfield just before 8 delayed a large section of the reserved-seat audience. The ushering staff in the Shed adhered rigidly to the rule that no one shall be seated after the music has started, with the result that some of the Berkshires' best people heard the first movement of the Beethoven "Eroica" from outside the Shed.

Awakens Memories

To those who have been, for reasons ranging from the practical to the esthetic, regular attendants at the Festival since its inception in 1934, last night's reopening after four wartime summers was remarkable for its nostalgic similarity to the Festivals of the prewar years. In general, the same ushers were ushering, the same program girls were giving out smiles and programs, the same men took tickets at the gates, the same people occupied the same boxes and the same seats, and the same reporters, photographers and Boston Symphony officials wandered on tiptoe about the grounds during the concert.

The only major changes from prewar times, none of them immediately noticeable to the uncurious, have been the enlargement of the stage, the paving of the approach to the also-enlarged ticket house and pressroom, the construction of a new paved entrance, a new lighting tower, and the substitution of a state police detail for Legionnaires to handle traffic.

Notables Present

The list of notables present for the opening concert included former Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, Mrs. Morgenthau and their daughter, Joan; Lt. Gov. Robert F. Bradford; Fritz Reiner, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony; Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, Benjamin Britten, whose opera "Peter Grimes" is to be given its American premiere at the Festival; Isaac Stern, violinist; William Kapell, the American pianist; Carol Glenn, violinist; Lowell Thomas, radio commentator, and an extensive collection of minor nobility.

Given Ovation

Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians, who are used to ovations, received as many as there were selections on the opening program. In addition, the conductor was given a thunderous welcome when he came on stage to open the 1946 series with the "Eroica," which was last played at Tanglewood on the second Thursday night of the 1941 series.

The second concert will be tomorrow evening at 8.15 and will consist of the Beethoven sixth, Rachmaninoff's piano concerto No. 2 in C minor, with Eugene List as soloist, and orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe."

Part of tomorrow night's concert, from 9.30 to 10.30, will be broadcast by WBRK.

MORGENTHAUS AT OPENING: Among the notables attending last night's Festival concert were former Secretary of the Treasury Henry J. Morgenthau M[illegible]hau, and daughter, Joan.

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL

JUL 26 1946

8,000 Hear 'Ninth' By Shostakovitch In Berkshires

LENON, Mass.—An audience estimated at 8,000 attended the opening of the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood last night with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the American premiere of Dmitri Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony.

The Russian composer's work is shorter and generally lighter than any of his earlier symphonic works, implying a change in his creative presentations. It calls for a full string choir, a large pulsate division — cymbals, triangle, gong, tympani and large and small drums, and piccolo, various wind instruments, two trumpets and a tuba.

Also included in the program was the Beethoven "Eroica" and the Ravel arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures From an Exposition." Next concert is tomorrow night in Tanglewood Shed with another program Sunday afternoon.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JUL 26 1946

Audience of 8000 Hears Symphony

LENOX, July 26 (AP) — An audience of nearly 8000 persons greeted warmly the first Western Hemisphere performance of Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Russian composer's Ninth Symphony was the first of a nine-concert series — the first postwar Berkshire Symphonic Festival—by Dr. Koussevitzky at the "Tanglewood" estate, home of the festival and Summer mecca of international audiences.

The new Shostakovich work, light and gay throughout with a few pensive but not tragic moments, lasted a little more than 20 minutes, as compared to the hour-long and war-clouded Seventh and Eighth Symphonies of the Soviet composer.

Dr. Koussevitzky described it as "notable for its brevity and cheerfulness."

The Largo from the Shostakovich Sixth and the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony comprised the rest of the program.

First nighters at Tanglewood included Conductor Fritz Reiner, the American pianist, William Kapell, and the English composer, Benjamin Britton, whose opera "Peter Grimes" is to be given its American premiere at the festival.

[202]

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—FRIDAY, JULY 26, 1946

Shostakovitch Ninth Opens Berkshire Music Festival

By CYRUS DURGIN

LENOX, July 25—The Ninth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovich was performed for the first time in America by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra here tonight at the opening concert of the eighth Berkshire Symphonic Festival. This work, comparatively new, by the eminent Russian composer, furnished the highlight of tonight's concert and probably the biggest news of the whole festival as well.

The symphony was cordially received by an audience estimated at 7500 persons, and the big music shed on the estate of "Tanglewood" resounded with applause both hearty and spontaneous. Whatever the future of the work, it seems that the Ninth Symphony is destined for prevailing and rapid popularity with the public. It is lively and bubbling and well equipped with tunes.

Both the fact of this premiere and the cosmopolitan aspect of the audience make this, the first Berkshire Festival since the war, probably the first festival in this country since hostilities ended to be truly of intellectual character. From practically all of the 48 states and Canada the audience came. There were at least two persons fresh from England — Benjamin Britten, composer of the opera "Peter Grimes," which will have its American premiere here Aug. 6, and Eric Crozier, who will stage the production.

Noted Audience Present

You could see more than a few famous people as you walked about the soft green lawns of "Tanglewood." There were conductor Fritz Reiner, William Kapell, the brilliant young American pianist; conductor Efrem Kurtz, cellist Gregor Piatigorsky (soon to be a festival soloist); Oscar Hammerstein 2d, author of "Oklahoma" and "Carousel," and former Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau.

In contrast to the humid warmth and occasional thunderstorms that have been unwelcome guests at previous festivals, the weather tonight was cool and clear, with a light wind blowing from the west. The clouds that obscured the setting sun were flecked with cherry-red at the moment Dr. Koussevitzky raised his baton for those mighty E-flat chords of the opening piece, Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The music shed was filled, and many people who had been unable to buy seats, stretched on the lawn before the shed and listened al fresco.

This opening program finally emerged a good deal changed from the one that was first announced. The Beethoven Symphony was followed by the Shostakovich Ninth and that in turn by excerpts from Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the orchestral version of Ravel.

First Appraisal of Work

The Shostakovitch Ninth presents the problem usual on first acquaintance with any new piece of music, and that is, can one see the forest for the trees? Of course, the answer always is, yes and no. Though they may later rise to plague me when further hearings have made the Ninth Symphony more familiar, here are some haphazard first impressions:

The Ninth is much shorter than either of its two tragic and war-born predecessors, the Seventh and Eighth Symphonies. It also is much lighter in character, and in the quick-paced first and last of the five movements is joyous almost to a degree of seeming trivial. It is very tricky music; the composer was right when he said musicians will like to play it. (He may not have been right when he said critics would enjoy blasting it; I for one had a good time listening).

The Ninth, like so much of what Shostakovich has written, is "effects" music. He delights in complicated passages and in combinations of strange instrumental qualities. The tuba carries on a dialogue with a solo violin in the first movement, for example, and in the moderato the woodwinds have a long and curious conversation.

Similarities to Other Works

Some one is going to suggest that the Soviet composer is writing himself out, although that would seem based on insufficient evidence. Nevertheless that first movement is strongly reminiscient of Prokofieff, and the moderato is very similar in mood and even in certain phrases to the largo of Shostakovich's Sixth Symphony.

Apart from the presto, which is a sort of scherzo and to my mind the most original movement, whenever the music gets going fast there is an implication that a full-fledged march will break out any moment. That is another strong characteristic of Shostakovich. The two slow movements become not only wistful but melancholy and for a few moments you think that the late war must have intruded its bitter and sorrowful memories upon the composer.

The performance seemed to be magnificently vital and so far as one without previous familiarity with the score could judge, accurate.

Beethoven's "Eroica" went beautifully, too, if you except a few loose ends in the scherzo. Though he has in recent weeks been carrying the double responsibility of directing the Berkshire Music Center and rehearsing the orchestra for the Festival, Dr. Koussevitsky was at the top of his form. As usual his conducting was vivid as lightning and elegant as fine velvet. The orchestra responded to his wishes superbly.

Resumption of the Berkshire festivals is attended by an unmistakable renewal of interest in music following the war. That is indicated not only in the size of the audience tonight, but in the unprecedented number of pupils who have been attending the school founded by Dr. Koussevitsky in 1940. There are 400 students, and 25 percent of them are former G.I.'s.

This is actually the eighth Berkshire Festival. They ran from 1934 to 1941, when the war forced them to shut down. There was a student festival in 1942, however. In 1944 and again last year, there were shorter festivals by a small orchestra of Boston Symphony musicians.

The current series will be resumed Saturday night when Dr. Koussevitsky will conduct Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony; the second piano concerto of Rachmaninoff with Eugene List as soloist and the second suite from Raval's "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet music.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
JUL 26

Koussevitzky Given Ovation For Shostakovich Premiere

Ninth Symphony Proves Tuneful and Popular at Tanglewood; Conductor Is 72 Today

By JOHN D. DONOGHUE

Lenox, July 25—As Serge Koussevitzky begins his 73d year today he must feel a glow of satisfaction, not only on the reception to last night's contest, but on the tribute paid him last night by the audience of 8000 for his achievements in building so fine an orchestra as the Boston symphony and so enduring a monument as the Berkshire Music festival and center.

Last night's concert, the first of the postwar festival programs, was quite the occasion, for it was featured by the American premiere of the Ninth symphony of Shostakovich, and yet it was the spontaneous gesture of affection and greeting which brought the entire audience to its feet as Dr Koussevitzky entered, that was the emotional high spot of the evening.

That is a large statement about program which also included the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony and seven excerpts from the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" as arranged by Ravel.

The truth is that elements unrelated to the music deprived the program of the impact that it would have imparted under different circumstances.

Dr Koussevitzky is a severe program maker. No overtures for him. However, vacation-minded audiences insist on arriving late, so that the first and second movements of the Beethoven symphony were almost like separate compositions last night instead of two essential units of a complete body. The conductor's exasperation with his late comers was quite evident in the dramatic way he slapped his hands to the side after his warning gesture that he was ready to start. Each of the movements had the typical Boston finish but the entire symphony failed of the effect it might have had otherwise.

The Shostakovich, which was completed last August, is a welcome addition to the Russian composer's output. It is easy to listen to, and hardly the tragic work that was promised following the last two "war" symphonies.

Russian commentators profess to see the Haydn influence. Certainly, there is much of the Haydn simplicity and charm, but there's many a musical trick that sounds like Prokofieff, especially in his "Lieutenant Kije."

The symphony is written in five movements, four of them quite gay. Only the largo movement harkens back to the two previous symphonies with its brooding, introspective music. It may be of interest to the purists to note that at the Russian premiere, the last three movements were encored. It looks like a busy season for this tuneful work.

Another of the Boston orchestra's specialties ended the program, the familiar "Pictures at an Exhibition." The gallery-visiting composer has written music which Ravel colored magnificently, and color is the stuff of which the Bostonians seem made. The audience particularly chuckled at the "Ballet of Chicks in Their Shells."

The audience gave the conductor and orchestra another ovation last night at the conclusion of the program. Saturday night the program at 8.15 will include the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony, the Rachmaninoff Second piano concerto with Eugene List as soloist, and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite by Ravel.

Shostakovitch Ninth Opens Berkshire Music Festival

By CYRUS DURGIN

LENOX, July 25—Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began tonight the eighth the huge music shed on the estate of "Tanglewood." This is not only the first post-war Berkshire Festival, but undoubtedly the first music festival of international proportions to be given in this country following the end of hostilities.

This festival of 1946 can be called truly international since the audience was made up of people from nearly all the 48 states and Canada. There were at least two directly from Europe: Benjamin Britton, English composer of the opera "Peter Grimes," which will be given first American performance here Aug. 6, and Eric Crozier, also from England, who will direct the production.

The international aspect was even more vividly exemplified when Dr. Koussevitzky conducted tonight the first performance in the Western hemisphere of the ninth Symphony by the Russian composer, Dmitri Shostakovitch.

8000 Attend Performance

The size of tonight's audience also testified to the renewed interest in music since the end of the war. The advance sale of tickets had been very large, and tonight's audience was estimated at nearly 8000 persons.

Many representatives of the U.N. are expected to attend in the course of the nine concerts. Tonight were seen more than a few famous musicians, conductor Fritz Reiner and William Kapell, the brilliant young American pianist, among them. Box holders from Boston and vicinity include Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Mrs. Franklin Hobbs, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Sawyer and Judge Raymond S. Wilkins.

Orchestra in Usual Top Form

Tonight's program began with the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven. This was followed by the Largo from the Sixth Symphony of Shostakovich, and that in turn by the Soviet composer's Ninth Symphony Although Dr. Koussevitzky has in recent weeks been carrying the double responsibility of directing his school, the Berkshire Music Center, and of rehearsals for the festival, his vigor and finesse were undimmed tonight. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as usual, was a the top of its form from first to last.

Nicolai Lopatnikoff, the composer, has joined the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center in the final weeks. He replaces composer Bohuslav Martinu, who is reported to be in hospital suffering from fractured wrists and ribs, and possible fracture of skull, sustained when he stepped off a terrace in the dark.

The festival will be resumed Saturday evening, when Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, the second piano concerto of Rachmaninoff, with Eugene List as soloist, and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet music.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
JUL 26 1946

Shostakovich 9th Symphony Premiered At Tanglewood

Lenox, Mass., July 25—(AP)—The first Western Hemisphere performance of the Ninth Symphony of the Russian composer, Dmitri Shostakovich, was played tonight as conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra resumed for the first time since the war the noted Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

The music shed on the "Tanglewood" estate, which is the home of the festival and summer mecca of international audiences, held nearly 8,000 persons as Dr. Koussevitzky began the first of a nine-concert series.

The new Shostakovich work—25 minutes long—was described by Dr. Koussevitzky as "notable for its brevity and cheerfulness."

The largo from the Shostakovich Sixth and the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony made up the rest of the opening program.

First nighters at Tanglewood included Conductor Fritz Reiner, the American pianist, William Kapell, the English composer, Benjamin Britton, whose opera "Peter Grimes" is to be given its American premier at the festival.

The audience found in the new Shostakovich symphony the familiar tonal finger prints of the Soviet composer, but unlike the hour-long and war-clouded Seventh and Eighth Symphonies, the Ninth is hardly more than 20 minutes long, light and gay throughout. There are pensive moments in this new Shostakovich creation, but none that are tragic.

The applause indicated that a short and carefree symphony, ending, like the Fifth and Sixth, with a sprightly march, was a welcome variation from the war-conscious Shostakovich of recent years.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD
JUL 26 1946

Berkshire Festival Opens

By OLIN DOWNES
(New York Times Staff Correspondent)

Lenox, Mass., July 26.—An audience of 8,000 and the American premiere of Dmitri Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony were distinguishing features of the opening concert of the ninth Berkshire Festival, given Thursday evening by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed at Tanglewood.

Shostakovitch's work, which is short and generally of lighter material than any of his preceding works in the great form, was preceded by the "Eroica" of Beethoven and followed by the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures From an Exposition."

The music of Beethoven, nobly conveyed, was welcomed with the emotion of an audience deeply moved by its message. It has been five years since the interpreting orchestra and a conductor had been heard together here. In that interval, a tortured world has greatly changed. But the eternal varieties of the symphony had not changed, and events of intervening years had only served to emphasize its significance.

It is not the general custom to wait for the second half of a program for one initial presentation of a new score, but it was doubtless the special content of the "Eroica" which caused Koussevitsky to feel its appositeness to the occasion. And it must be said, with no reproach intended, that Shostakovitch's latest symphony is in no similar vein. It is prevailingly gay and sometimes paradistic in tone.

Written with this composer's customary swiftness and facility in the single month of August of last year, it makes no pretenses to the epic or oracular vein of the seventh and eighth symphonies which immediately preceded it. The form is classic, the orchestra almost so in its proportions.

A more romantic mood is provided by the lyrical second movement. Perhaps the most unusual procedure is encountered in the short movement, a dialogue between a solo bassoon and lower brass instruments, that serves as an interlude between the third and last parts.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
JUL 26 1946

8,000 At Premiere Of Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony

Lenox, Mass., July 26—(AP)—An audience of nerly 8,000 persons greeted warmly the first Western Hemisphere performance of Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Russian composer's Ninth Symphony was the first of a nine-concert series—the first postwar Berkshire symphonic festival—by Dr. Koussevitzky at the "Tanglewood" estate, home of the festival and summer mecca of international audiences.

The new Shostakovich work, light and gay throughout with a few pensive but not tragic moments, lasted a little more than 20 minutes as compared to the hour-long and war-clouded Seventh and Eighth symphonies of the Soviet composer.

Dr. Koussevitzky described it as "notable for its brevity and cheerfulness."

The largo from the Shostakovich Sixth and the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony comprised the rest of the program.

First nighters at Tanglewood included conductor Fritz Reiner, the American pianist; William Kapell, and the English composer, Benjamin Britton, whose opera "Peter Grimes" is to be given its American premiere at the festival.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 26 1946

Koussevitzky Premieres Shostakovich's Ninth

By CARL E. LINDSTROM
Special to The Hartford Times

Lenox, Mass. — Time and the world which have always refused to turn backward in their precipitate flight, last night did return to one of the most beautiful musical mores New England ever knew with the re-opening of Tanglewood's festival pavilion.

The 6,000-or-so seats were bright with new paint and all sold out; Dr. Koussevitzky looking himself and happy as both audience and his Boston Symphony Orchestra arose in a spontaneous ovation when he stepped upon the wide stage; the trimly barbered lawns and hedges of Tanglewood and a cool Berkshire night—all this was an ante-bellum memory restored to actuality. I can think of nothing else that has yet come back to its pristine loveliness.

Dr. Koussevitzky made top-line news in the first concert by presenting Shostakovich's new Ninth Symphony in its Western Hemisphere premiere. Like many of its predecessors, this Ninth was attended by a publicity campaign that would cause American promotional enterprise to turn apple green with envy. Weeks ago we knew all about the circumstances of its creation, all the statistics of its length, breadth and instrumentation, its moods and its facture. We certainly knew what to listen for.

* * *

IN ONE RESPECT, at least, it has not been accurately heralded. The much-advertised gaiety and lightness have been somewhat oversold. I found the second, and by far the longest and keynote movement, saturated with typical Russian meloncholy— at times a rather poignant melancholy. It lapses into Schostakovich's besetting fault of discursiveness and thin writing but this merely serves to prolong an accentuate the general sunlessness of that section. It begins with an attenuated clarinet solo which at length becomes a duo. Presently a flute joins in the meanderings and the movement turns into a woodwind monopoly until the strings are invited in well toward the finish.

The end movements live up to their advance notices for exuberance and a certain flip lightheartedness. There are quaint twists of melody that have the unmistakable Shostakovich stamp. His reliance upon march tempo in his brighter moods is almost a fixed idea. These strains are infectious but superficial. The final allegretto contains almost a direct quotation from the "March of the Wooden Soldiers."

* * *

AS IN ALL OF Shostakovich there are touches of the bizarre—a passage for tuba and solo violin, stentorian brass unisons, a tweak here and a twaddle there. People are enormously amused by this kind of writing but are not deeply stirred.

For all its idiosyncracies, I think Shostakovich's Ninth will be heard long after his Seventh and Eighth have been filed away as important but ponderous documents.

* * *

THE EROICA SYMPHONY is a favorite season opener with Dr. Koussevitzky. It has served that purpose several times in Symphony Hall in recent years and it began this ninth season at Tanglewood.

The fact that it was paired with Shostakovich invites observations upon the force or lack of it that politics plays in music. Shostakovich has always avowed politics as a major motivating element. But when the revolutions and the sieges are merely pages in the history book, the music will have to stand on its own.

The Eroica was born of flaming political impulse but hardly was the ink dry when its creator, disillusioned, ripped off the title page in fury and with it every vestige of political implication.

It is platitudinous to say that such a masterpiece as Beethoven's Third grows greater with the passage of the years. An interpretation like that Koussevitzky gave us could not have occurred within the composer's lifetime, not so much because our orchestra could not then have been matched but because of the ripening of tradition.

Music of this magnitude does not come into complete existence all at once. It grows along with mankind and the development of such orchestras as Boston's. Some of Koussevitzky's phrases, his intensification, even some prettying up of an essentially rugged score could be criticized as un-Beethovian refinements, but he and his orchestra with its unrivalled technical perfection have taught us this language and it leaves us breathless and lifted up.

The program finished with a score which is tailored to the Bostonian brand of magnificence and polish, Ravel's scoring of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

This Clipping From
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

JUL 26 1946

Week End Listening For Music Lovers

This will be the last Week End Listening column for five weeks, but the classical music listing will resume after Sept. 15.

Two articles in the July issue of "Musical Digest" magazine attack radio's disregard for the tastes of good music-lovers. The advertising agencies and networks share the blame for the death of good music on the air, as compared to the uniquitous "soap operas" and the so-called comedians, in both these articles. In a quote from an official of the CBS system, given last July, he stated that 3,000,000 listeners would like to hear good music all the time, and 6,000,000 half the time. The wishes of this large group are being nearly ignored, however, according to Editor Harold Schonberg, who illustrates this in a breakdown of station offerings for one week in June, when good music came out a poor last in the listings of the major stations.

The Boston Symphony continues its Berkshire Festival program Saturday night from 8:30 to 9:30 over WSUN. Koussevitsky conducts the group in the lovely Rachmaninoff "Piano Concerto No. 2" with the famous young American pianist, Eugene List as solo artist. The full orchestra will again be employed in this program, which will conclude with the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite of Ravel.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JUL 26 1946

Music

Shostakovich 9th Takes Berkshires Bow

By ROBERT BAGAR.

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., July 26.—The seventh symphonic festival had its inaugural last night before a capacity audience in the now-celebrated music shed at Tanglewood. It is a colorful and attractive show in a dignified manner that the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, put on here in surroundings that are ideal from any standpoint.

First and probably most ideal are the acoustics, which make listening a pleasure from practically any part of the Tanglewood grounds. Add to that a briskly cool summer evening, with a breeze at every measure, the odor of the green, green grass, the rustle of leaves at every one of the conductor's downbeats, the general orderly look of things and the serenity of it all.

The whole neighboring countryside is just jamming with festival-bound pilgrims. This mecca in the Berkshires has gained tremendously in prestige and popularity since 1941, the date of the last complete festival. And it is not hard to see why. If it ever grows to the point where it will rival in scope (if it has not already done so in musical performance) the famous festivals of Europe, there is one man to whom the great credit really belongs, and that, of course, is Serge Koussevitzky, whose altar Tanglewood is.

Shostakovich Premiere.

In keeping with the spirit of things, the return to music normality in these parts, after the war years, was the opening orchestral program offered the American premiere of the Ninth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovich. Companioning it were the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven—another composer who wrote a ninth symphony—and the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition," as incomparably orchestrated by Ravel.

Shostakovich's Ninth, for which the world—or a great part of it—long has been waiting, was completed in August, 1945. It was given its first performance anywhere at Leningrad by the Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra on Nov. 3 of the same year, Eugene Mrakinsky conducting.

John N. Burk, in his excellent program note, quotes Shostakovich as saying of the work: "It is a merry little piece. Musicians will love to play it, and critics will delight in blasting it."

Perhaps Shostakovich was being prophetic, perhaps not. In any case, this "merry little symphony" is merry in the Shostakovich manner. The first movement starts as you expect it to—against zany little tunes in the wind instruments.

Flippancy in Movement.

The mood of this music is flippant, even smart-alecky. It has two tongues, one in each cheek, and both blown up balloon size. Why should the Russian composer, for all his technical address and poise and skill, choose to play around with ordinary tunes, for one thing, and why should he treat them with as much lampoonery as he does, for another? These twin abilities of his are completely at variance with the moments of true creation which are found in the second movement.

Here a mournful, almost acidulous quality is noted in the music. There is a hesitant, tentative feel about it, with occasional sections of gathering intensity. Real depth of thought is to be found here, and—as always, Shostakovich shows that he is at his best, from the viewpoint of communicating ideas, when he is writing a slow movement.

The rest of the work is again persnickety. But, at least, the workmanship is ever clear and precise, and all through this Ninth Symphony is the hand of the expert craftsman. The form is quite traditional, in spite of five moments, the third, fourth and fifth of which are played without pause.

As the Bostonians performed this work, one heard little cries of delight at some tidy bit of buffoonery in the score. The rendering was entirely up to this orchestra's best standards.

Beethoven's "Eroica" received a more passionate going-over than I ever have heard from Dr. Koussevitzky. The Marcia Funebre, which had a sense of fury about it, proved particularly absorbing. And the Moussorgsky-Ravel once more got its fullest quota of refined and expressive Boston Symphony treatment.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JUL 26 1946

Tanglewood Again Echoes With Music

Berkshire Festival Brings Koussevitzky And Boston Symphony

BY T. H. PARKER.

Lenox, Mass., July 25.—The curtain went up again at Tanglewood here tonight, on a full scale Berkshire Music Festival for the first time since it was rung down by the tocsins of war in 1941.

It proved to be the same old, bon ton carousel. Things have not changed a bit, despite the whirling times and the four years quietus. More than 6000 persons, a complete sell out, sat within the tinny confines of Eliel Saarinen's piece of Finnish functionalism to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, while some 1000 more paid $2 for all the grass they could sit on, on the broad lawns around the music shed.

The boxes of the elite were again tenanted by dowagers shrouded in the summer equivalent of mink, and accompanied by debutante daughters well tanned in shades ranging from mulatto to octaroon. They had arrived in cars long enough and luxurious enough to suggest that they had been made by the Pullman Company, parked for the first time since the festivals began in hard surfaced parking areas.

As an affaire modiste it was not quite so dressy as in the prehistoric festival days but it was very gay, very gay indeed.

Celebrities were a dime a dozen as usual and the price of admission included, or will include before the three week end programs are over, the opportunity of treading on such toes as those of Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Mrs. Edward S. Harkness, Princess Emina Toussoun of Egypt, or Mrs. Cole Porter (nice treading too) in clambering to your seat.

Hoi Polloi Outside.

Outside the shed, hoi polloi in sport shirts and shivers, in grouping ranging from musicality to amorosity, huddled in the chill damp of evenings, apparently oblivious of everything except that which brought them here (of previous musicality and amorosity). It was no cooler on the lawn than in the al fresco shed, but the lawn was damp, very damp, from yesterday's big wet making listening out a partially amphibious operation.

It was a superior concert. The audience rose to a man in tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky as he stepped up on the podium at the starting hour of 8:13, the first of the ovations which greeted the entire performance.

Boston's celebrated conductor appeared slightly thinner, slightly more wane than at his last appearance at Bushnell Memorial, but these physical qualities were not reflected in the performance. It was full of the old Koussevitzky show and blow, interspersed, especially in the Beethoven "Eroica" which opened the program, with the increasing refinement and delicateness of sentiment which have been marking the newer, later day Koussevitzky for the past two or three years.

The final Moussorgsky "pictures at an exhibition" contained the grand glimmer, all the flamboyant massiveness and showy fantasy which the conductor and the orchestra for years have combined to make the work one of their superlative offerings.

Shostakovitch's Ninth.

But the chef d'oeuvre of the evening was the first performance in America of the Shostakovitch Ninth Symphony.

To many who have trekked with the Muscovy marvel across the Siberian wastes of his immediately preceding symphonies, number nine will come as a smite between the eyes, or ears. Except for a slow freight trip to Vladivostok in the second of its five movements, the new work is gay, infectious, full of good humor concluding with a regular Russian carnival of noisy marching airs. It plays about 35 minutes. In structure the movements are academic in style, the harmonies are traditional except for a few cacophonic passages. The melodies are free and sweet. As usual, Mr. Shostakovitch got rhythm, and plentifully. The whiting is much more coherent and cohesive than in his preceding symphonies. And much of it is extremely facile both in idea and orchestra treatment. This of course, has always proved true of Shostakovitch in his lighter movements.

A lot of Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony is merely cute, some of it is boring as only he can bore, but by and large it is engaging, as was attested to by the applause which was warm if not riotous. No sensation, it will have novelty value at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JUL 26 1946

Shostakovich Premiere Starts Festival Series

First U. S. Presentation of Ninth Symphony Heard at Tanglewood

By Willard Clark

LENOX, July 25 — The Berkshire Music Festival given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, really got under way at Tanglewood tonight. True, there have been chamber music and choral concerts, as well as operatic offerings during this month. But tonight, with the huge music shed filled to capacity, and with hundreds of listeners outside — for one hears with amazing clarity outside the shed—the festival proper really started as Dr. Koussevitzky stepped onto the platform amid prolonged applause. It was a brilliant audience, perhaps numbering some 10,000 persons. The boxes were filled with those who came to see and be seen. The air was alive with a babel of tongues, for the festival draws the most cosmopolitan audience to be found anywhere, just as it provides the finest musical fare. People came early, admired the view of the Stockbridge bowl, the age-old boxwoods, the gardens, and all the other physical features which make Tanglewood so ideal a site for a music festival.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
JUL 26 1946

Words and Music

Berkshire Festival Opens To a Chi-Chi Audience

By John Briggs

Lenox, Mass., July 26 — You got off the train at the familiar tiny station. The mountain had turned purple and a late afternoon sun spilled gold across the meadows. A waiting car whisked you away. As you strolled across the well-manicured green lawn of Tanglewood, where an eager crowd already was hurrying into the music shed for the evening's concert, you felt at last the war was really over. The Berkshire Festival was back, and it was bigger and more dazzling than ever.

A chi-chi crowd, with more summer formals than in prewar seasons, turned out for the concert by Serge Koussevitzky and the Bostonians which tonight opened the current festival series. Against this fashionable background Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra presented a concert well worth coming to the Berkshires for.

Shostakovitch Ninth

The big event was the first performance in this country of a new symphony by the inexhaustible Dimitri Shostakovitch. It was written in six weeks last summer, between the end of the fighting in Europe and Victory in the Pacific. It had its first performance in Leningrad last November and later made its way throughout the Soviet Union.

The new symphony is in violent contrast to the two gigantic pieces which preceded it. Shostakovitch's Seventh and Eighth symphonies, each lasting over an hour, were turbulent works reflecting the maelstrom of warfare in which Shostakovitch and other Soviet citizens were then engaged. The new work is half an hour long. It is a sunny, good-humored composition, with here and there traces of the earlier whimsy that made Shostakovitch the most famous of tongue-in-cheek composers.

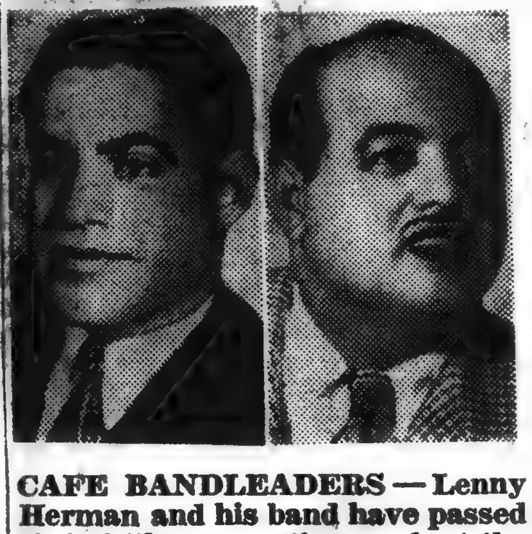
The Ninth Symphony is in five movements. The first, a rapidly-moving allegro, is frothy, full of dissonances and rattling snaredrums. The second, marked moderato, begins with a long clarinet solo, using the familiar Shostakovitch device of writing at the very top of its range to make the instruments as screechy as possible. Then comes a rich, full-bodied midsection front strings that at first hearing is one of the most effective parts of the symphony.

A presto, largo and allegretto, played without pause, brings the work to its conclusion. The allegretto is a lovely piece, abounding in piquant dissonance and crud Moussorgsky-sounding passages in the brass.

As is customary at such occasions, the audience received the new piece with prolonged enthusiasm.

Shostakovitch's own appraisal of the Ninth Symphony was: "It is a merry little piece. Musicians will love to play it and critics will delight in blasting it."

The program opened with Beethoven's "Eroica." Mr. Koussevitzky, aided by the superb musicians under his baton and the incredibly fine acoustics of the shed, played a performance that made me feel I was hearing the work for the first time. Mr. Koussevitzky, as usual, made the parts stand out in bold relief. No detail was obscured; the "Eroica" was exciting music, as it always should be and too seldom is. Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" brought the evening's music to a rousing close.



CAFE BANDLEADERS — Lenny Herman and his band have passed their 25th consecutive week at the Hotel Bossert in Brooklyn. And Noro Morales' orchestra supply the rhumba rhythms at Bill Miller's Biviera.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUL 27 1946

Koussevitzky Is 72 Years Old

LENOX, Mass., July 26 (U.P.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, observed his seventy-second birthday here today by rehearsing the orchestra for a Berkshire music festival concert. The noted musician was greeted by a rendition of "Happy Birthday." Dr. Koussevitzky is head of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Festival.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
JUL 26 1946

Koussevitzy Back With Boston For Three Berkshire Broadcasts

Serge Koussevitzky returns to the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening for the first of three special broadcasts from the Berkshire Music Festival. For this broadcast, to be carried over CFCF and the ABC at 9.30 p.m., the permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony will have his complete orchestra around him. (Two previous broadcasts from the Berkshire Festival have been devoted to programs of Bach and Mozart, thus reducing the ensemble).

For the first full-orchestra program, Dr Koussevitzky has selected Eugene List, young American pianist, as soloist. List will be heard in the familiar Piano Concerto No. 2 of Rachmaninoff.

One other number will be heard on the broadcast program, the second Daphnis Et Chloe Suite of Ravel, with which Dr. Koussevitzky will close the broadcast.

Next Saturday, Carol Brice, young American contralto, will be the soloist and, on August 10, the final broadcast of the festival will bring to American listeners the first radio performance of the Shostakovich Ninth Symphony.

6—The Berkshire Evening Eagle, Friday, July 26, 1946

Shostakovitch Symphony Featured at Tanglewood

Overflow Audience Gives Koussevitzky and Orchestra Cordial Welcome as Festival Reopens

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

When Serge Koussevitzky stepped to the Tanglewood podium last night to lead his huge, full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first concert of the ninth season of the Berkshire Festival, the entire audience which overflowed the immense shed, rose to greet him in cordial and respectful homage. A cool but beautifully clear and crisp evening favored this initial program which included an expectantly awaited first American performance of a new symphony by the most popularized contemporary Russian composer, Dimitri Shostakovitch.

Activities at Tanglewood in this first year since the war's interruption have been resumed and expanded with literally the diligence and industry of bees and ants. Concerts of smaller dimensions, rehearsals, group practice, individual application, have been carried on through with immense zeal, industry and fervor.

But all of these have been but a prelude to the three week ends of nine concerts which began last night. Many improvements have been made on the grounds and in the facilities aiming toward the convenience and handling of the multitudes who assemble for these concerts, and, no doubt, at the coming concerts, more people will arrive earlier, and more-familiarized attendants will expedite the seating so that there will be no more delays for that reason.

In Fine Fettle

The Boston orchestra was never in finer fettle. Its responsiveness was reflected in the refined details and, in its turn, the robust abandon with which it attacked the Beethoven third symphony. Koussevitzky's "Eroica" is a traditionally-established interpretation, and, possibly because of the importance of the occasion, the performance came off with warm vibrancy.

But it was the Shostakovitch ninth that was the starred event of the program. When Beethoven made such a monument of his final and ninth symphony, he erected almost a permanent mental hazard for all future and following composers. Some superstitiously feared that their career too would end with a ninth; others declined to enter into competition with such a musical landmark. Mahler made all sorts of detours when he arrived at that point in his life; Sibelius has hesitated for years at the threshhold of his ninth. But not so Shostakovitch. He has solved the matter by refusing to see it as a problem at all, and written a light, comparatively short work in five curt movements, the last three of which are grouped and played without pause. There is nothing now to halt or hinder him from continuing to write symphonies which may be counted in decades, especially if he continues to adopt the manner and methods of this current new one.

Figures Recognizable

Immediately recognizable are his facile, gay, impudent and trifling rhythmic figures, which in his special way he can construct into sequences and flowing lines for which he has undisputed flair. Indeed his inventive banality is avoided or obscured by this rhythmic elan. There is agreeably present again the wit and spirit which has heretofore characterized his work although it would be interesting to know if what we recognize as clever humor is not the expression of a different sentiment emanating from the social circumstances in which the composer lives.

We assume that Dr. Koussevitzky programmed the "Eroica" and this new composition before the manuscript of the latter was in his hands, and, that in so doing, he was placing side by side two symphonies whose martial background had some similar, even though farfetched, martial connotations. Beethoven's dedication, "To a Hero," was inspired, of course, by the then dominating star of Napoleon; Shostakovitch's last two symphonies had their roots in the political events and heroic achievements of the armies of his country and so it might have been reasonable to expect some such stage setting for this one. In any case he has obviously declined to enter any such lists, and has written if there must be a comparative allusion, more in the manner of the patter of Sir Arthur Sullivan than anyone else who comes to mind.

The more quiet movements are well voiced in the wind sections the woodwinds in the moderato and the brass in the largo, but we wonder if some American composers have not equally valid symphonies resting neglected and unbidden on their shelves which would certainly be as worthy of consideration and trial as the eagerly-grasped works which fall so easily from the pen of the over-rated fair-haired scion of our great ally.

The excerpts from the Moussorgsky, "Pictures at an Exhibition," in their orchestral version by Ravel which Koussevitzky selected to end the program was a wise and happy choice. It allowed the orchestra to display its glorious resources of tone production, and, by a most discreet and canny seating shift, to produce the broad and large effects without direct impact.

Martinu, Composer At Tanglewood, Injured in Fall

GREAT BARRINGTON — Bohuslav Martinu, well known Czech composer and violinist, and faculty member at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, is at Fairview Hospital in Great Barrington suffering from fractured ribs and wrists and a possible fracture of the skull when he fell at Barrington School where he is staying. Nicolai Lopatnikoff of Pittsburgh, Pa., has come to replace him on the faculty.

The FESTIVAL MUSIC with Serge KOUSSEVITZKY

and the Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Premieres Shostakovich's Ninth

By CARL E. LINDSTROM
Special to The Hartford Times

Lenox, Mass. — Time and the world which have always refused to turn backward in their precipitate flight, last night did return to one of the most beautiful musical mores New England ever knew with the re-opening of Tanglewood's festival pavilion.

The 6,000-or-so seats were bright with new paint and all sold out; Dr. Koussevitzky looking himself and happy as both audience and his Boston Symphony Orchestra arose in a spontaneous ovation when he stepped upon the wide stage; the trimly barbered lawns and hedges of Tanglewood and a cool Berkshire night—all this was an ante-bellum memory restored to actuality. I can think of nothing else that has yet come back to its pristine loveliness.

Dr. Koussevitzky made top-line news in the first concert by presenting Shostakovich's new Ninth Symphony in its Western Hemisphere premiere. Like many of its predecessors, this Ninth was attended by a publicity campaign that would cause American promotional enterprise to turn apple green with envy. Weeks ago we knew all about the circumstances of its creation, all the statistics of its length, breadth and instrumentation, its moods and its facture. We certainly knew what to listen for.

* * *

IN ONE RESPECT, at least, it has not been accurately heralded. The much-advertised gaiety and lightness have been somewhat oversold. I found the second, and by far the longest and keynote movement, saturated with typical Russian melonchol y— at times a rather poignant melancholy. It lapses into Schostakovich's besetting fault of discursiveness and thin writing but this merely serves to prolong an accentuate the general sunlessness of that section. It begins with an attenuated clarinet solo which at length becomes a duo. Presently a flute joins in the meanderings and the movement turns into a woodwind monopoly until the strings are invited in well toward the finish.

The end movements live up to their advance notices for exuberance and a certain flip lightheartedness. There are quaint twists of melody that have the unmistakable Shostakovich stamp. His reliance upon march tempo in his brighter moods is almost a fixed idea. These strains are infectious but superficial. The final allegretto contains almost a direct quotation from the "March of the Wooden Soldiers."

* * *

AS IN ALL OF Shostakovich there are touches of the bizarre—a passage for tuba and solo violin, stentorian brass unisons, a tweak here and a twaddle there. People are enormously amused by this kind of writing but are not deeply stirred.

For all its idiosyncracies, I think Shostakovich's Ninth will be heard long after his Seventh and Eighth have been filed away as important but ponderous documents.

* * *

THE EROICA SYMPHONY is a favorite season opener with Dr. Koussevitzky. It has served that purpose several times in Symphony Hall in recent years and it began this ninth season at Tanglewood.

The fact that it was paired with Shostakovich invites observations upon the force or lack of it that politics plays in music. Shostakovich has always avowed politics as a major motivating element. But when the revolutions and the sieges are merely pages in the history book, the music will have to stand on its own.

The Eroica was born of flaming political impulse but hardly was the ink dry when its creator, disillusioned, ripped off the title page in fury and with it every vestige of political implication.

It is platitudinous to say that such a masterpiece as Beethoven's Third grows greater with the passage of the years. An interpretation like that Koussevitzky gave us could not have occurred within the composer's lifetime, not so much because our orchestra could not then have been matched but because of the ripening of tradition.

Music of this magnitude does not come into complete existence all at once. It grows along with mankind and the development of such orchestras as Boston's. Some of Koussevitzky's phrases, his intensification, even some prettying up of an essentially rugged score could be criticized as un-Beethovian refinements, but he and his orchestra with its unrivalled technical perfection have taught us this language and it leaves us breathless and lifted up.

The program finished with a score which is tailored to the Bostonian brand of magnificence and polish, Ravel's scoring of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

[205]

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

JUL 27 1946

8,000 Revel in the Music of Boston Symphony Program

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

Eight thousand music lovers converged at "Tanglewood's great orchestral shed Thursday night to revel in the music offered by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of its dynamic leader, Serge Koussevitzky, open for the first time since the war. As usual, Dr. Koussevitzky, enhanced his reputation as a program builder with a superb variety of musical fare which included the "Eroica" symphony by Beethoven; the first performance in America of Shostakovitch "Ninth" symphony and Moussorgsky's tone poem, "Pictures at an Exhibition." Performances of the first and third portions of the program were projected with the meticulous perfection of the Bostonians, with the full orchestra, under superb control, and with its wealth of strings and woodwinds, presenting a critic-proof, and audience-approved rendition. These are traditional with the orchestra, and were played with the traditional eclat of the organization.

SURPRISE NUMBER

The surprise of the evening was the Shastakovitch "Ninth." Translated into terms of the fruit of the vine, the "Eroica" furnished the solidity of the hops and malt product; "Pictures" the ready port wine and Shastakovitch, the champagne of the program.

We had come prepared to hear something ponderous and obtuse, generated by the Russian composer after having been exposed to the rigors of his war-torn country. Instead, Mr. Sastakovitch must have had a change of heart, with the result that the "Ninth" is one of the most sparkling, spritely, utterly delightful pieces of easily assimilated music in all contemporary symphonic literature.

Applauding the movements of the classic symphonies is taboo by Dr. Koussevitzky. His raised disparaging hands in the "Eroica" soon brought an embrassing cessation from certain enthusiastic members of the audience. Not so, however, during the playing of the "Ninth." Each movement brought its own uninhibited approval of the several parts of the work, with Dr. Koussevitzky, breaking his usual reserve, accepting the applause, not only in the spirit in which it was accorded, but giving the impression that he, too, was overly pleased with the approval of his pioneering spirit in introducing to an American audience the controversial work of a Russian composer." "Bravos" and tremendous salvos of applause brought the maestro back to the podium for many recalls at the conclusion of the work.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUL 26 1946

6000 Jam Shed at Tanglewood Premier

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, July 25.—This afternoon the weatherman withdrew his threat of rain, which has drenched so many Tanglewood premiers, and tonight these beautifully spacious grounds were elegantly primed and resplendent for the music of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

This Berkshire festival opening was undoubtedly one of the most spectacular sights in the history of music festivals. The mammoth shed, with its openings on three sides, was jammed with over 6000 spectators.

Among them was a galaxy of world celebrities that kept the flash bulbs bursting and put the autograph hounds in a dither. There were Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Lady Berenson of New Zealand, Princess Toussoun of Egypt, Mrs. Joseph Kennedy, H. V. Kaltenborn, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Spalding, not to mention an awesome "Who's Who" of musicians.

At the last concert in 1941 more persons heard the music from the outlying grounds than from the shed.

This wasn't true tonight, but nevertheless the immense grounds were generously freckled with small groups who sat or reclined and were well able to hear the beautiful sound that swelled from the shed.

Given Great Ovation

Any "Doubting Thomas," harboring a suspicion that Dr. Koussevitzky has reached the stage of inefficient batonist, due to advancing years, would have been cured tonight of any such delusions. Never have I seen the veteran conductor demand results and imbue his style with more vitality. The ovation he was given when he stepped upon the platform was reminiscent of those accorded Paderewski in his last tours. The audience promptly stood and the applause was long and hearty.

The program's most discussed and anticipated work was "Symphony No. 9, Opus 70," by Shostakovich, which was given its first Western Hemisphere performance here tonight. Five years ago the same composer's "Symphony No. 7" was accorded the same honor. In the course of three-quarters of an hour, the "Seventh Symphony" ranted and shouted the discord and horror that was associated with the siege of Leningrad, that allegedly inspired the symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

JUL 27 1946

Berkshire Music Festival Opens with Shostakovitch

Ideal weather for the first time in five years graced the return of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Thursday night. Closed during the war years, the well-known music shed with its seating capacity of 6,500 had been sold out for weeks in advance.

An overflow audience of about 3,000 was on hand to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting, in the first American performance of the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 9.

Last night's concert, given in the great shed, which has been newly painted, was the first of three weekend events, and attracted many distinguished guests.

Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Mrs. Henry Morgenthau Jr. were in the audience. In a box with Mr. and Mrs. John Shepard Jr. were Prince and Princess Ladišlas Sapieha and her mother, Baroness Louise Bornemixza.

Baroness Hubert de Viry of Shipton Court, Lenox, was accompanied by her mother, Countess Max de Foras and sister Mlle. Huguette de Foras of Chateau de Thuyset, Thonon-les-Bains, France. Mr. and Mrs. Woodbridge Strong (Joumine de Viry) also were with them.

Princess Eugenia Ruspoli, formerly of Castello di Nemi, Rome, was accompanied by her son-in-law and daughter, Prince and Princess Alexis Droutzkoy of Rome, who are at Crutis Hotel for the festival.

With Mrs. George Otis Rockwood of Laurel Mere, Stockbridge, was her daughter, Princess Diane R. Eristavi.

Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Crane had as box guests her brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. Pomeroy Day of Hartford, and Anis Fuleihan, a Greek composer who is at the Pittsfield Music School.

Mr. and Mrs. Basil de Selincourt of London and Dr. and Mrs. Rustin McIntosh, New York, were box guests of Dr. and Mrs. Walter W. Palmer of New York and Tyringham.

In a box with Miss Anna Remsen Alexandre and her sister, Mrs. Alexandre Hoppin, were Mr. and Mrs. George K. Livermore, and Mr. Ralph Pulitzer.

* * *

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

JUL 27 1946

Words and Music

At Tanglewood There's Always Room for One More Blanket

By John Briggs

Tanglewood, Mass., July 27 — The Berkshire Music Festival is at once a very superior musical event, a workshop for gifted music students and one of the pleasantest places in New England for a vacation.

The three weekly concerts by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are, of course, the main attraction. There are other concerts at which young singers sing and young musicians play their instruments, young composers hear their works performed and young conductors coordinate the whole. And to fugitives from subways and neon signs, a placid stroll across the lawns and through the gardens of Tanglewood, with the Berkshire Mountains in the distance, is a final compensation for the long journey up from Manhattan.

Tanglewood is a pleasant place to hear music in the summer. I should think it would also be a pleasant place to work. Obviously it is desirable to keep gifted young performers at their trade instead of leaving them to their own devices for the summer; career-minded musicians always are fighting a losing battle with time. The Center's most spectacular alumnus to date is Leonard Bernstein, one of Dr. Koussevitzky's bright young men; in all probability others will emerge at frequent intervals.

The students come from all over. Invitations are sent out to most of America's music schools, promising talent is auditioned either at Symphony Hall or during the Boston Symphony's winter tours. This year the Center rejected five hundred applicants. Those accepted were from most of the States, Canada and South America.

The focus of the Berkshire Center is the music shed, a severely functional yellow building shaped like a piece of pie, with the stage at its apex. Being entirely seasonal it has a roof but no sides. Its acoustical properties are incredible. It is large enough for 6,000 people. It covers an acre of ground. You can hear a cough on the stage from any seat. Thanks to its design there are no echoes or dead spots.

Even outside the shed proper, as much as four hundred yards from the stage, it is possible to hear the music with astounding clarity. Many visitors take advantage of this fact by merely buying admission to the grounds. This costs two dollars. It is the equivalent of standing-room at most concerts. At Tanglewood, however, when you buy standing-room you bring a blanket, a snack, a few bottles of beer and a friend, relax on the grass and hear the music as luxuriously as a Roman senator.

Even with the music shed's 6,000 seats all taken, nobody is turned away at the gate. There is no such thing as a sold-out house at Tanglewood; you can always find room for one more blanket.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JUL 27 1946

FOOTBALL FAN—This picture of Dmitry Shostakovich, never before printed in this country, shows a facet of the Russian composer's personality little known to most Americans. He is an inveterate football fan. Some of the players at a rugby game he attended last Fall asked him to pose with them, holding the ball, so that they could have a souvenir picture for their clubhouse wall. Shostakovich's 9th Symphony, given its American premiere this week at the Berkshire Music Festival will be aired for the first time on Aug. 10 over WJZ by the Boston

---

BERKSHIRE EAGLE

Many Festival Boxes Taken For Opening

Nearly Half Engaged for All Three Week Ends

Many of the 90 boxes in the Shed at Tanglewood have been reserved by the same families who held them at the last performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1941. Nearly half have been engaged for the entire season and most of those remaining for at least two series.

Berkshire County permanent and summer residents holding boxes, some for the ninth season, are: From Pittsfield, Mrs. E. A. Jones, Harry F. McRell, Mr. and Mrs. Laurence R. Connor, Mr. and Mrs. Carey R. Kinney, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley P. Benton, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel G. Colt; Dalton, Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Crane, Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop M. Crane Jr.; Lenox, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Kennedy, Mrs. E. Griswold Hollister, Miss Anna Alexandre, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Shepard Jr., Mrs. John L. Senior, Mrs. David T. Dana, Miss Ellen Bullard, Mr. and Mrs. Lester Roberts, Mrs. Clarence A. Warden.

From Stockbridge, Mrs. Ramsay C. Hoguet, Walter Hoving, Mr. and Mrs. D. P. Morgan, Miss Mabel Choate, Mrs. George W. Rockwood, Mrs. John Barry Ryan, Mrs. Norman Scott, Mr. and Mrs. Heaton I. Treadway, Mr. and Mrs. Owen Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. David B. Karrick, Mrs. Charles C. Griswold, Mrs. Henry I. Parsons; Lee, Mrs. C. David Lloyd, Mrs. Norval H. Busey Jr.; Tyringham, Mr. and Mrs. Walter W. Palmer; Great Barrington, Mr. and Mrs. William Felton Barrett, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Blodgett, Mr. and Mrs. Robert K. Wheeler, Mrs. William Rosenblatt; Williamstown, Mr. and Mrs. John F. Treadway, Prof. and Mrs. Philip Marshall Brown; Dr. Walter VonHorst of Housatonic and Peter Schweitzer, New York.

For single concerts reservations have been made by Mrs. W. Rockwood Gibbs of Richmond, Mrs. Cole Porter of Williamstown, Col. Arthur D. Budd of Windsor and Mr. and Mrs. Leighton Rollins of Lenox.

Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees who have taken boxes are: John Nicholas Brown of Providence and Newport, for all concerts; Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Sawyer and Raymond S. Wilkins for the first series; Mr. and Mrs. Philip Allen of Boston for the second series. Mrs. Ernest B. Dane of Chestnut Hill, widow of a former president of the orchestra, will come from Center Harbor, N.H., to remain for all the concerts.

Among the well-known box holders are Mrs. Myron F. Taylor of Locust Valley, member of the board of directors of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival; Mr. and Mrs. Archibald MacLeish of Conway and Washington; Mrs. William Mather Lewis of Colebrook, Conn., widow of the late president of Lafayette University; Mrs. Alvin T. Fuller of Boston and Rye Beach, N. H., wife of former Governor Fuller and orchestra trustee.

[206]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JUL 27 1946

Serious Aims Rule at Tanglewood

Koussevitzky Sees Music Uniting People of World

By ROBERT BAGAR

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., July 27.—While all days are working days for the budding Koussevitzkys, Piatigorskys, Coplands, and so on, there are others, the music lovers who came to Tanglewood's temple to search for, perhaps, a recharging of the spirit or for the very practical aim of hearing music in beautiful surroundings.

There are also some who come to these events for all the above reasons, besides cherishing the idea of walking with the gods of music, breathing the same air they breathe and, possibly whispering "Qh's" and "Ah's", as some mighty personality of the sharps and flats chances to sit down right next to them on a rustic bench.

At the Berkshire music center, a major aspect of Koussevitzky's dream is a place of instruction. Gifted youngsters from all over gather here, after making the grade, to replenish their stock of musical knowledge. There are advanced students in the instrumental fields.

Music Unites World.

Also numerously present are operatic aspirants and still others, the dilettantes of the future, who maybe go in for choral classes and attend the lectures given by the various distinguished musicians who make up the faculty.

At the opening of the Berkshire music center Dr. Koussevitzky said, "today, in a period of an unprecedented crisis in history, when men find no common contact and means of understanding each other, when all notions and values have lost their former significance, music is an element of unity among men.

"More than any other art, music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers, and speaks a language accessible to all.

"It is a great blessing and deep joy to be serving music at a time when its radiant influence is revealed to the world with such conviction, and when the meaning of music is justifying also the meaning of man's existence."

These words, spoken by a man who has made a brilliant career in music, reflect the attitude of the contemporary artist, devoted to his metier and also to the betterment of the society in which he lives. And one senses, in this festival milieu, a seriousness of purpose in all that takes place at Tanglewood, from scholastic activity to concert performance, even though that be al fresco and in the most pleasant atmosphere.

Shostakovich Ninth.

The American premiere of the Shostakovich Ninth Symphony Thursday is a case in point, for all the boisterous, playful and rather futile effect of a considerable part of the score. For Shostakovich, during the war, was widely acclaimed as the composer speaking for the people of his country, who were suffering and working, while a hated enemy drove deeply into Russia.

However, nobody expected the ninth symphony to be another of Shostakovich's cyclonic sermons, nor, for that matter, did anyone expect it to be the thing it was, trite, unconvincing, coy and corny, except for the second movement, which had something to say, at least. The Russian composer couldn't have been that ecstatic with the victory over Germany as to express his feelings as childishly as that.

I wanted to hear a symphony that had substance, imagination, warmth and immediacy. Triumph or no triumph, when Shostakovich wishes to write things like that he can, but he fell easy victim, as he so often does, to seductions of the moment. What he did any composer with a technique can do.

Anyway, the Berkshire symphonic Festival is with us again, and that is great news to all music lovers. What is happening at Tanglewood is only a beginning. Perhaps, we all may look forward to a complete realization of Koussevitzky's dream in the very near future.

Pictures on Exhibit
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JUL - - 1946

STUART C. HENRY, Director of the Berkshire Museum at Pittsfield, Mass., writes:

"We are planning two important exhibitions for this summer, one The History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (on view from July 23 through August 20). This is being organized by the Boston Symphony at our request and will include the well known Sargent portrait of Major Higginson, founder of the Orchestra, portraits of the great conductors and artists, photographs of the various homes of the Boston Symphony, program notes and memorabilia.

"Then on August 2nd, our Annual Summer Members' Night, we are opening the first large exhibition of Impressionist Paintings ever to be shown in Pittsfield. I know that unfortunately for us your vacation from active duty usually takes place when we hold our most important shows. Can one of you not get up for the Festival and take in our Members' Night on August 2nd and see these exhibitions. Dr. Koussevitsky is to speak, and we are planning a really gala time.

"You will note that in connection with the Impressionist Exhibition we are including a gallery of comparative photographs, showing the actual locales along side of the photographs of the paintings themselves. We are also including photographs and busts of the artists, lent largely by Mr. John Rewald and Durand-Ruel."

* * *

This Clipping From
YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

JUL 27 1946

Eugene List Is Soloist At Berkshire Festival

The first of three festival programs from the Berkshire Music Festival will be broadcast at 9:30 tonight on WFMJ, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the full Boston Symphony Orchestra and Eugene List as piano soloist.

List will play the familiar and beloved Piano Concerto No. 2 of Rachmaninoff. One other number will be heard in the hour-long presentation, the Second Daphnis et Chloe Suite by Ravel. On Aug. 10, the Boston Symphony will present the American premiere of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 in this same radio series.

WTAM will broadcast the Hollywood Gold Cup horse race, at 8:30 p. m. In this race the outstanding West Coast horses will be entered. Busher, the leading money-winner of 1945, is back in training this year for the race.

The raving bobby-sox clan can get in the spirit again tonight when Frank Sinatra makes a rare summer appearance as replacement for Tony Martin at 7:30 p. m. on WKBN. Tony has been ill. Georgia Gibbs is the regular feminie attraction on the series.

The St. Louis Municipal Opera broadcast will feature Soprano Wilma Spence and Baritone Edward Rocker in a concert at 7 p. m. on WKBN. The entire program will revolve around selections from operettas such as "The Firefly," "Roberta," "The Merry Widow" and "Show Boat."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 28 1946

BERKSHIRE THRONG HEARS EUGENE LIST

Pianist Plays Rachmaninoff Concerto Before 10,000 at Second Concert of Fete

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 27 — The second concert of the ninth Berkshire Festival tonight elicited an audience bigger by 2,000 than the 8,000 persons at the opening concert of Thursday, and an atmosphere of festivity that was heightened by brilliant and exciting performances.

These characterizations refer particularly to the second part of the program, which presented Eugene List as soloist in the performance of the second Rachmaninoff piano concerto, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in their incandescent performance of the excerpts from the second "Daphne and Chloe" suite of Ravel—a performance which is sheer exultant virtuosity not only in letter but in spirit; when the whole orchestra like a pack in full cry responds with unparalleled swiftness and glory of motion to the releasing magic of its leader's baton.

Receives Warm Welcome

There was keen anticipation and the warmest of welcome for Eugene List, who had stepped into such fortitous publicity by his famous performance, as GI sergeant and pianist for President Truman, Stalin and Churchill at Potsdam. This reclamé had conceivably something to do with the proportions of the audience which had bought out this concert first of all the programs of the festival, and which spread almost as far as the eye could reach from the Music Shed over the lawns outside.

But the integrity and musicianship of Mr. List honestly won for him his reward. It is true that he emphasized rather more the lyric than the lordly aspects of the work, and in a few details, such as in the opening chords, which were waved and robbed of some of their massivity, departed from the most powerful style. But it was a conception complete and masterly in itself, the mark of an admirably equipped virtuoso and a true musician.

Beethoven Symphony Played

Of course, the greatest interpretation of the evening came with the noble serenity and beauty of the reading of the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony. It is an interpretation not new to these festivals, and one which should properly become a tradition here and a feature of each season. So revealed, this music would evoke its atmosphere in the most garish enclosed concert hall in the world.

But it has a singular adequacy to and consonance with the beauty of the nature that surrounds the open-air auditorium. Few are the composers who can stand unashamed and undwarfed, as Beethoven does, in the presence of nature, and fortunate the interpreter who can match such truthfulness. It was felt by all tonight that the conductor, the orchestra, the sounds of all the instruments had been equal to the integrity of Beethoven and the Berkshire countryside.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 27 1946

Billboard Awards On WSPR; List Solos at Tanglewood

Top actors and actresses of the legitimate theater will reenact their parts in the performances for which they will receive the third annual Donaldson awards tonight during a special broadcast over WSPR from 7.30 to 8. The Donaldson awards, representing in the legitimate theater what the famous "Oscars" signify in the motion picture world, were instituted by the Billboard in honor of W. H. Donaldson, who founded in 1894 the magazine which is a leading weekly in the amusement field.

"State of the Union" will be honored as the outstanding drama of the year and Ralph Bellamy and Myron McCormick of the cast will accept the award and do an excerpt from the play. Other awards will go to Ray Bolger as the best dancer and male performer in a musical and to authors, directors and performers in additional Broadway productions. The Donaldson awards are based on the voting of the "people of the theater," from critics through stagehands and producers.

Eugene List, young American pianist, is guest soloist tonight with the full Boston Symphony orchestra in a performance of Rachmaninoff's familiar "Piano Concerto No. 2." The concert also includes Ravel's "Daphnis et Choloe" suite and is broadcast from the Berkshire Music festival at Tanglewood over WSPR at 9.30.

Jean Bedetti at Congregational Church Tomorrow

LENOX—Jean Bedetti, first violin-cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the guest soloist at the service of morning worship at the Church on the Hill, Congregational, tomorrow at 11. He will play the adagio from the Concerto in D by Haydn and the adagio from the Concerto in B flat by Boccherini. The pastor, Rev. J. Herbert Owen, will deliver the sermon on the subject, "The Jesus Must Find."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 28 1946

Art Notes

The Berkshire Museum, Pittsfield, Mass., is giving a comprehensive show of French Impressionist Painting to be opened next Friday evening on the occasion of the museum's annual Summer Members' Night program. An exhibit of "The History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," including portraits, photographs and memorabilia of the organization, also has been arranged as a feature with special reference to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

* * *

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUL 28 1946

Ovation for Pianist List At Berkshire Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, July 27.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, assisted by Eugene List as piano soloist, tonight gave the second concert in this ninth Berkshire Music Festival. Not only was the shed jammed to its full capacity of 6000, but the surrounding terrain was occupied by more than 5000 additional auditors.

Koussevitzky initiated the program with Beethoven's "Symphony No. 6, in F Major, Ojus 68" (Pastoral). Last Thursday night, it was the more stern, rampant "Eroica Symphony" by the same composer that opened the series. One never tires of writing about Koussevitzky's concepts of classic works. His appraisals of tempo and general treatment of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven all have marked resemblance.

Beauty of Tone, Shading

Tonight, the clear string phrases of the Pastoral were beautifully proportioned both as to tone and shading. This was particularly true of the exquisite second movement. This is nothing new for the perfect symmetry of the Boston Symphony's string section remains unparalleled. The symphony's storm sequences were injected with drama, but the prevailing impression of the entire work was one of placid serenity.

The audience, however, was less praiseworthy. In spite of the conductor's protest there was applause after each movement, and after the second movement the audience continued murmuring its approval so that the conductor was required to interrupt the following movement's opening phrase twice before resuming. His obvious displeasure was apparent and justified.

Ovation For List

Eugene List received what need be described as an ovation. This 28-year-old pianist has been the subject of merited (and it must be admitted, fortunate) publicity. Ex-Army sergeants are not numerous on the concert stage, his playing at Potsdam was a privilege, and not many young pianists have Hollywood backgrounds. However, these are incidentals for this young pianist is an artist of stature.

It's a great temptation to write of tonight's performance of Rachmaninoff's "Piano Concerta No. 2, in C Minor, Opus 18" in comparison to William Kapell's at the Worcester Festival in 1944, for both had special merit in spite of non-conformities.

Meets Problems Easily

List hasn't the formidable technique of Horowitz (nor has anyone else) but he did unravel the concerto's digital extravagances with remarkable ease. The real power in his playing laid in the clear sightedness with which he dug into Rachmaninoff's penetrating content.

The solemn, almost apprehensive opening chords were not played with tragic implications, and throughout the concerto, there was a refreshing absence of the frenzy that occasionally typifies its performance. The orchestra played its score magnificently. Koussevitzky maintained excellent balance, permitting the occassiionally suppressed piano phrases to assume unusual prominence.

The program closed with an effervescent performance of Ravel's second ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." Making indiscriminate demands, as it does, on every instrument down to the last of the second violins, it played showcase for the orchestra's liberal assets. The results were marvelous to hear.

Tomorrow afternoon, the first of the three series of concerts will close. The program is Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony." Copland's "Appalachian Spring Suite" and Tschaikowsky's "Fifth Symphony."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JUL 27 1946

Serious Aims Rule at Tanglewood

Koussevitzky Sees Music Uniting People of World

By ROBERT BAG[illegible]

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., July 27.—While all days are working days for the budding Koussevitzkys, Piatigorskys, Coplands, and so on, there are others, the music lovers who came to Tanglewood's temple to search for, perhaps, a recharging of the spirit or for the very practical aim of hearing music in beautiful surroundings.

There are also some who come to these events for all the above reasons, besides cherishing the idea of walking with the gods of music, breathing the same air they breathe and, possibly whispering "Oh's" and "Ah's", as some mighty personality of the sharps and flats chances to sit down right next to them on a rustic bench.

At the Berkshire music center, a major aspect of Koussevitzky's dream is a place of instruction. Gifted youngsters from all over gather here, after making the grade, to replenish their stock of musical knowledge. There are advanced students in the instrumental fields.

Music Unites World.

Also numerously present are operatic aspirants and still others, the dilettantes of the future, who maybe go in for choral classes and attend the lectures given by the various distinguished musicians who make up the faculty.

At the opening of the Berkshire music center Dr. Koussevitzky said, "today, in a period of an unprecedented crisis in history, when men find no common contact and means of understanding each other, when all notions and values have lost their former significance, music is an element of unity among men.

"More than any other art, music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of cross[illegible] social, political, geographic[illegible] and religious barriers, [illegible] a language accessi[illegible]

"It is a great b[illegible] deep joy to be serving [illegible] a time when its radiant [illegible] is revealed to the world with such conviction, and w[illegible]n the meaning of music [illegible] also the meaning of man's existence."

These words, spoken by a man who has made a brilliant career in music, reflect the attitude of the contemporary artist, devoted to his metier and also to the betterment of the society in which he lives. And one senses, in this festival milieu, a seriousness of purpose in all that takes place at Tanglewood, from scholastic activity to concert performance, even though that be al fresco and in the most pleasant atmosphere.

Shostakovich Ninth.

The American premiere of the Shostakovich Ninth Symphony Thursday is a case in point, for all the boisterous, playful and rather futile effect of a considerable part of the score. For Shostakovich, during the war, was widely acclaimed as the composer speaking for the people of his country, who were suffering and working, while a hated enemy drove deeply into Russia.

However, nobody expected the ninth symphony to be another of Shostakovich's cyclonic sermons, nor, for that matter, did anyone expect it to be the thing it was, trite, unconvincing, coy and corny, except for the [illegible] movement, which had something to say, at least. The Russian composer couldn't have been that ecstatic with the victory over Germany as to express his feelings as childishly as that.

I wanted to hear a symphony that had substance, imagination, warmth and immediacy. Triumph or no triumph, when Shostakovich wishes to write things like that he can, but he fell easy victim, as he so often does, to seductions of the moment. What he did any composer with a technique can do.

Anyway, the Berkshire symphonic Festival is with us again, and that is great news to all music lovers. What is happening at Tanglewood is only a beginning. Perhaps, we all may look forward to a complete realization of Koussevitzky's dream in the very near future.

Pictures on Exhibit
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JUL - - 1946

STUART C. HENRY, Director of the Berkshire Museum at Pittsfield, Mass., writes:

"We are planning two important exhibitions for this summer, one The History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (on view ~~from~~ July 23 through August 20). This is being organized by the Boston Symphony at our request and will include the well known Sargent portrait of Major Higginson, founder of the Orchestra, portraits of the great conductors and artists, photographs of the various homes of the Boston Symphony, program notes and memorabilia.

"Then on August 2nd, our Annual Summer Members' Night, we are opening the first large exhibition of Impressionist Paintings ever to be shown in Pittsfield. I know that unfortunately for us your vacation from active duty usually takes place when we hold our most important shows. Can one of you not get up for the Festival and take in our Members' Night on August 2nd and see these exhibitions. Dr. Koussevitzky is to speak, and we are planning a really gala time.

"You will note that in connection with the Impressionist Exhibition we are including a gallery of comparative photographs, showing the actual locales along side of the photographs of the paintings themselves. We are also including photographs and busts of the artists, lent largely by Mr. John Rewald and Durand-Ruel."

* * *

This Clipping From
YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
JUL 27 19[illegible]

Eugene List Is Soloist At Berkshire Festival

The first of three festival programs from the Berkshire Music Festival will be broadcast at 9:30 tonight on WFMJ, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the full Boston Symphony Orchestra an[d] Eugene List as piano soloist.

List will play the familiar and beloved Piano Concerto No. 2 of Rachmaninoff. One other number will be heard in the hour-long presentation, the Second Daphnis et Chloe Suite by Ravel. On Aug. 10, the Boston Symphony will present the American premiere of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 in this same radio series.

WTAM will broadcast the Hollywood Gold Cup horse race, at 8:30 p. m. In this race the outstanding West Coast horses will be entered. Busher, the leading money-winner of 1945, is back in training this year for the race.

The raving bobby-sox clan can get in the spirit again tonight when Frank Sinatra makes a rare summer appearance as replacement for Tony Martin at 7:30 p. m. on WKBN. Tony has been ill. Georgia Gibbs is the regular feminie attraction on the series.

The St. Louis Municipal Opera broadcast will feature Soprano Wilma Spence and Baritone Edward Rocker in a concert at 7 p. m. on WKBN. The entire program will revolve around selections from operettas such as "The Firefly," "Roberta," "The Merry Widow" and "Show Boat."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUL 28 1946

BERKSHIRE THRONG HEARS EUGENE LIST

Pianist Plays Rachmaninoff Concerto Before 10,000 at Second Concert of Fete

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 27 — The second concert of the ninth Berkshire Festival tonight elicited an audience bigger by 2,000 than the 8,000 persons at the opening concert of Thursday, and an atmosphere of festivity that was heightened by brilliant and exciting performances.

These characterizations refer particularly to the second part of the program, which presented Eugene List as soloist in the performance of the second Rachmaninoff piano concerto, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in their incandescent performance of the excerpts from the second "Daphne and Chloe" suite of Ravel—a performance which is sheer exultant virtuosity not only in letter but in spirit; when the whole orchestra like a pack in full cry responds with unparalleled swiftnes. and glory of motion to the releasing magic of its leader's baton.

Receives Warm Welcome

There was keen anticipation and the warmest of welcome for Eugene List, who had stepped into such fortitous publicity by his famous performance, as GI sergeant and pianist for President Truman, Stalin and Churchill at Potsdam. This reclame had conceivably something to do with the proportions of the audience which had bought out this concert first of all the programs of the festival, and which spread almost as far as the eye could reach from the Music Shed over the lawns outside.

But the integrity and musicianship of Mr. List honestly won for him his reward. It is true that he emphasized rather more the lyric than the lordly aspects of the work, and in a few details, such as in the opening chords, which were waved and robbed of some of their massivity, departed from the most powerful style. But it was a conception complete and masterly in itself, the mark of an admirably equipped virtuoso and a true musician.

Beethoven Symphony Played

Of course, the greatest interpretation of the evening came with the noble serenity and beauty of the reading of the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony. It is an interpretation not new to these festivals, and one which should properly become a tradition here and a feature of each season. So revealed, this music would evoke its atmosphere in the most garish enclosed concert hall in the world.

But it has a singular adequacy to and consonance with the beauty of the nature that surrounds the open-air auditorium. Few are the composers who can stand unashamed and undwarfed, as Beethoven does, in the presence of nature, and fortunate the interpreter who can match such truthfulness. It was felt by all tonight that the conductor, the orchestra, the sounds of all the instruments had been equal to the integrity of Beethoven and the Berkshire countryside.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
JUL 27 19[illegible]

Billboard Awards On WSPR; List Solos at Tanglewood

Top actors and actresses of the legitimate theater will reenact their parts in the performances for which they will receive the third annual Donaldson awards tonight during a special broadcast over WSPR from 7.30 to 8. The Donaldson awards, representing in the legitimate theater what the famous "Oscars" signify in the motion picture world, were instituted by the Billboard in honor of W. H. Donaldson, who founded in 1894 the magazine which is a leading weekly in the amusement field.

"State of the Union" will be honored as the outstanding drama of the year and Ralph Bellamy and Myron McCormick of the cast will accept the award and do an excerpt from the play. Other awards will go to Ray Bolger as the best dancer and male performer in a musical and to authors, directors and performers in additional Broadway productions. The Donaldson awards are based on the voting of the "people of the theater," from critics through stagehands and producers.

Eugene List, young American pianist, is guest soloist tonight with the full Boston Symphony orchestra in a performance of Rachmaninoff's familiar "Piano Concerto No. 2." The concert also includes Ravel's "Daphnis et Choloe" suite and is broadcast from the Berkshire Music festival at Tanglewood over WSPR at 9.30.

Jean Bedetti at Congregational Church Tomorrow

LENOX—Jean Bedetti, first violin-cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the guest soloist at the service of morning worship at the Church on the Hill, Congregational, tomorrow at 11. He will play the adagio from the Concerto in D by Haydn and the adagio from the Concerto in B flat by Boccherini. The pastor, Rev. J. Herbert Owen, will deliver the sermon on the subject, "The Jesus Must Find."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD
JUL 28 [illegible]

Art Notes

The Berkshire Museum, Pittsfield, Mass., is giving a comprehensive show of French Impressionist Painting to be opened next Friday evening on the occasion of the museum's annual Summer Members' Night program. An exhibit of "The History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," including portraits, photographs and memorabilia of the organization, also has been arranged as a feature with special reference to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JUL 28 1946

Ovation for Pianist List At Berkshire Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, July 27.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, assisted by Eugene List as piano soloist, tonight gave the second concert in this ninth Berkshire Music Festival. Not only was the shed jammed to its full capacity of 6000, but the surrounding terrain was occupied by more than 5000 additional auditors.

Koussevitzky initiated the program with Beethoven's "Symphony No. 6, in F Major, Opus 68" (Pastoral). Last Thursday night, it was the more stern, rampant "Eroica Symphony" by the same composer that opened the series. One never tires of writing about Koussevitzky's concepts of classic works. His appraisals of tempo and general treatment of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven all have marked resemblance.

Beauty of Tone, Shading

Tonight, the clear string phrases of the Pastoral were beautifully proportioned both as to tone and shading. This was particularly true of the exquisite second movement. This is nothing new for the perfect symmetry of the Boston Symphony's string section remains unparalleled. The symphony's storm sequences were injected with drama, but the prevailing impression of the entire work was one of placid serenity.

The audience, however, was less praiseworthy. In spite of the conductor's protest there was applause after each movement, and after the second movement the audience continued murmuring its approval so that the conductor was required to interrupt the following movement's opening phrase twice before resuming. His obvious displeasure was apparent and justified.

Ovation For List

Eugene List received what need be described as an ovation. This 28-year-old pianist has been the subject of merited (and it must be admitted, fortunate) publicity. Ex-Army sergeants are not numerous on the concert stage, his playing at Potsdam was a privilege, and not many young pianists have Hollywood backgrounds. However these are incidentals for this young pianist is an artist of stature.

It's a great temptation to write of tonight's performance of Rachmaninoff's "Piano Concerta No. 2, in C Minor, Opus 18" in comparison to William Kapell's at the Worcester Festival in 1944, for both had special merit in spite of non-conformities.

Meets Problems Easily

List hasn't the formidable technique of Horowitz (nor has anyone else) but he did unravel the concerto's digital extravagances with remarkable ease. The real power in his playing laid in the clear sightedness with which he dug into Rachmaninoff's penetrating content.

The solemn, almost apprehensive opening chords were not played with tragic implications, and throughout the concerto, there was a refreshing absence of the frenzy that occasionally typifies its performance. The orchestra played its score magnificently. Koussevitzky maintained excellent balance, permitting the occasionally suppressed piano phrases to assume unusual prominence.

The program closed with an effervescent performance of Ravel's second ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." Making indiscriminate demands, as it does, on every instrument down to the last of the second violins, it played showcase for the orchestra's liberal assets. The results were marvelous to hear.

Tomorrow afternoon, the first of the three series of concerts will close. The program is Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," Copland's "Appalachian Spring Suite" and Tschaikowsky's "Fifth Symphony."

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUL 26 1946

Shaw Prepares for Beethoven's Ninth

Lenox, July 26—Robert Shaw is shown directing a chorus for Beethoven's Ninth symphony which will be sung at the final concert of the Berkshire festival Sunday afternoon, August 11. Shaw, a native of California, is a former winner of a Guggenheim fellowship and gained fame as director of the Waring glee club. Now on the faculty at the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood, he is, during the winter season in New York, director of the Collegiate Chorale. Soloists for the Ninth symphony, to be given under the direction of ~~Serge Koussevitzky,~~ are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, alto; Jose[illegible] Laderoute, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

X - 9

This Clipping From
NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

This Clipping From
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES

JUL 27 1946

This Clipping From
PATERSON, N. J.
NEWS

JUL 27 1946

This Clipping From
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN

JUL 27 1946

This Clipping From ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL

JUL 27 1946

This Clipping From TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD

JUL 27 1946

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 28 1946

This Clipping From
FARGO, N. D.
EVENING FORUM

AUG 1 1946

This Clipping From DAVENPORT, IA.
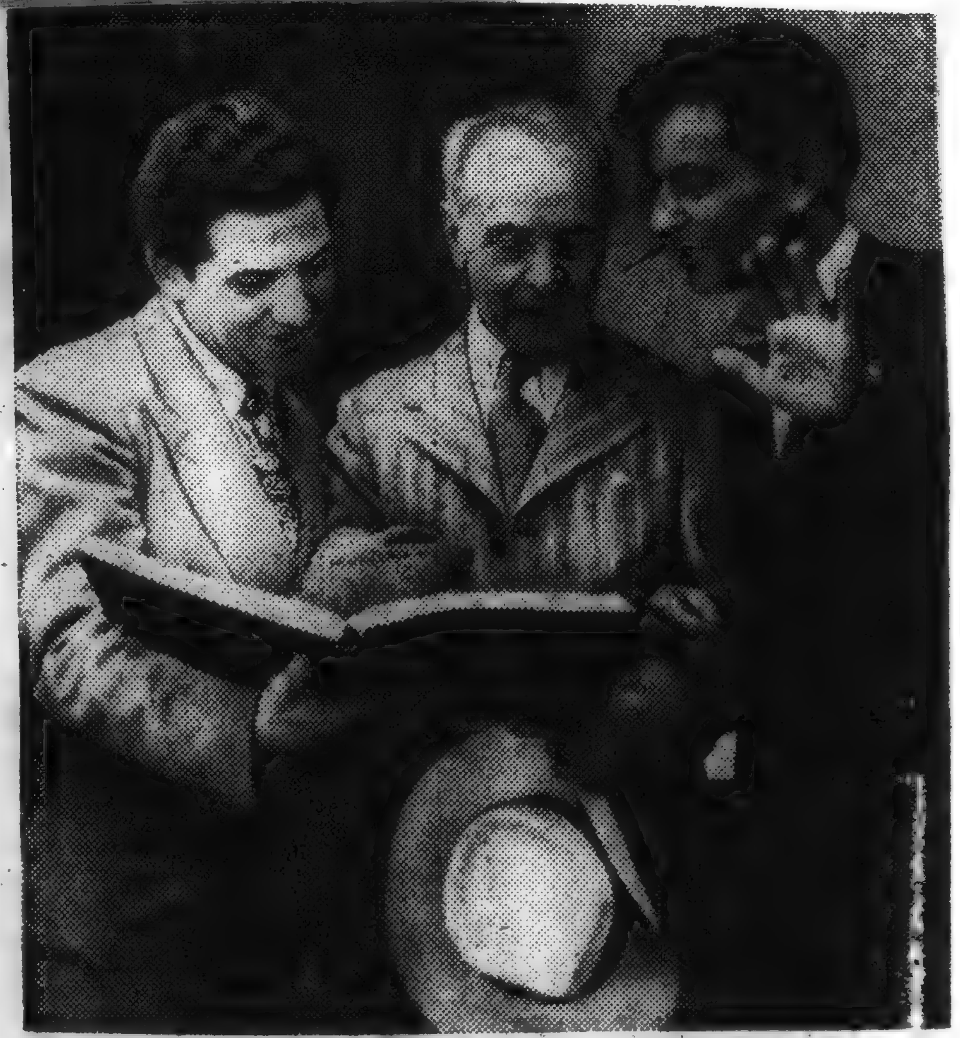
DEMOCRAT

JUL 25 1946



GOING OVER SCORE—Tenor William Horne (left), selected by Serge Koussevitzky (center) to sing the title role in the American premiere of the English opera, "Peter Grimes," at the Berkshire festival, Tanglewood, Mass., goes over the score with Dr. Koussevitzky and Leonard Bernstein, conductor of the premiere performance.

This Clipping From ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

JUL 28 1946

Shostakovich's Opus To Be Played On ABC

Arrangements have been completed by ABC to have the radio premiere in the United States of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 recorded and sent to the composer at his home in Russia.

The radio premiere, by the Boston Symphony orchestra on August 10 over ABC, will mark the first airing of the work outside of Russia.

Shostakovich, in this symphony of 25-minute duration, touched with parody and grotesqueness, recalls his first symphony, the ballet "Golden Age" and his opera "Nose." Although classic in style, even Morzartean at times, his own ironic idiom and sense of comedy have not been overlooked. The symphony is in E flat minor and is listed as Opus 70.

FULLERTON, CALIF.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From
MEDINA, N. Y.
JOURNAL-REGISTER

JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From MARSEILLES, ILL.
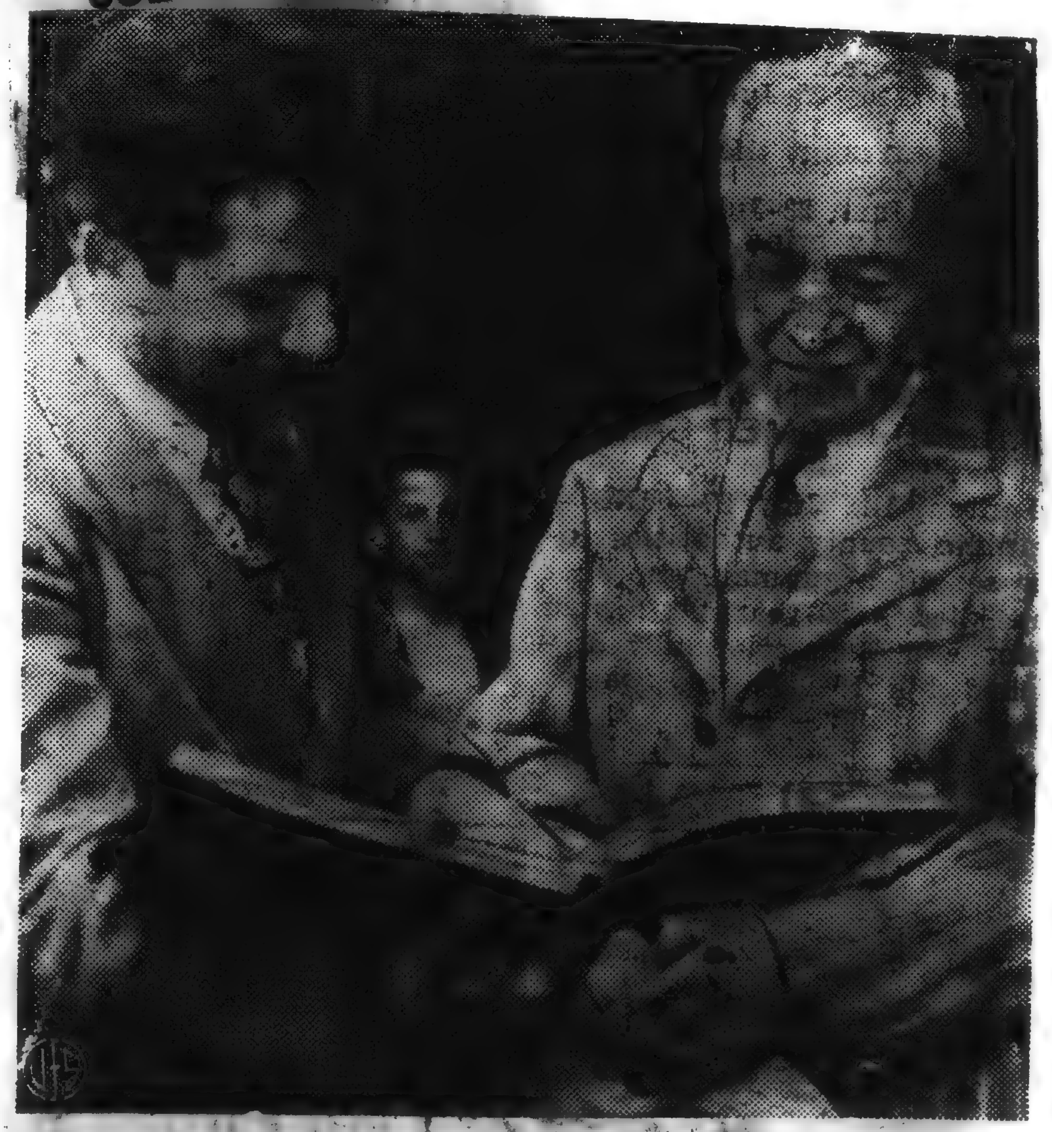
PRESS

JUL 27 1946



FESTIVAL SINGER—William Horne, left, tenor selected by ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~ to sing title role in American premiere of English opera, "Peter Grimes," at Berkshire music festiv goes over the score with Dr. Koussevitzky. The presentat of the opera is considered one of the year's most impor musical events. It will be given Aug. 6.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUL 28 1946

New Opera Will Have American Debut Aug. 6

Stockbridge, Mass. — (UP) — The first American performance of the new opera "Peter Grimes" will be given at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood Aug. [illegible]

Written by Benjamin Briton of London, the opera was chosen to reopen the Sadler Wells Opera after the war. Eric Crozier, who directed the world premier in London, will stage the opera here.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JUL 28 1946

Eugene List Performs At Tanglewood

Young Pianist Charms Sell-Out Audience at Berkshire Festival

Lenox, Mass., July 27. —(Special.)— The chill mountain air congealed a Tanglewood audience in its seats here tonight, but Eugene List helped considerably to thaw them out.

The 28-years-old pianist who as a GI at the Potsdam conference won comradely words from Stalin for a program of Russian Cossackskies, played the second concerto of Rachmaninoff with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second concert of the 1946 Berkshire festival series which opened last Thursday and continues through the next two week ends.

Sell-Out Audience.

Both his youth and his performance charmed the sell-out audience to generous if not excited reactions. Looking exceedingly boyish with his half grown-out army haircut pompadouring out over his forehead, he shyly accepted the warm applause which greeted him on his entrance, and then sat down riveting his attention on the keyboard like a schoolboy determined to lick a hard exam.

The shyness of his stage presence was matched by the temper of his performance, which was delicately poetic in the plangent second movement of the concerto and rather fragile in the opening and closing sections. There was no display of pyrotechnics of any kind, and if Mr. List has any of the glitter or flamboyance which is almost necessarily part of the concertists' equipment, he failed to disclose it on this occasion.

It was not entirely an impressive performance, and the young pianist had all he could do in many spots to hold his own, or the piano's own, against the massive structure which the Boston players were rearing as their contribution to the ideas of Rachmaninoff. Dr. Koussevitzky bent himself double to give the solist every advantage and the orchestra itself made a fine, noble thing of the concerto. Mr. List however created the impression that his field will ultimately turn out to be the recital stage, rather than the concerto platform.

Idyllic Scene.

The program opened with Beethevens Pastoral symphony apt enough for the idyllic scene here, where fireflies wink their semaphores around the music shed, night birds stir and moths spiral upward in the beams of the shed lights, looking for all the world like planes trying to escape the stabbing shafts of AA searchlights. The performance was pleasant but not special. Closing the evening was the second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite of Ravel. Many souls were not hardly enough to endure the night's rigors, however, and the attendance was considerably thinned as they retreated for warmer climes, after the Rachmaninoff.

Sunday afternoon's concert, beginning at 3:30, will offer Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, Copland's "Appalachian Spring," and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 28 1946

Pittsfield, Mass.

The annual summer Members Night of the Berkshire Museum will be held on Aug. 2 from 8 to 11:30 o'clock. The program for the evening will include the showing of a new color-sound movie, produced by Dr. Frank H. Howard, president of the California Ski Association; a brief address by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on "The Future of Tanglewood" and two exhibitions—one of portraits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the other a show of "French Impressionist Painting."

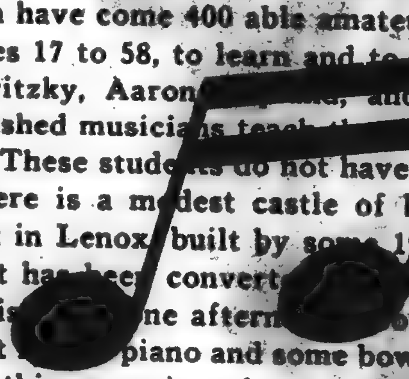
MUSIC LOVES COMPANY

R. I. Musicians Study at Tanglewood under Watchful Tutelage of Boston Symphonists

STORY BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE
PICTURES BY HARRY A. SCHEER

LENOX, MASS.—Music, like misery, loves company. Your true fiddler can entertain himself for a time, but presently he wants, at least, a pianist; or another fiddler, a viola, and a 'cellist; or a few woodwinds and brasses, perhaps, and percussion, and a conductor. And, to be entirely happy, an audience.

This tendency to congregate, this desire to mingle tone with tone at any hour and in any circumstances, so characteristic of the performing musician, receive its utmost opportunity at Tanglewood, where the Berkshire Music Center industriously floods a lovely countryside with usually lovely sound. From 33 states, from the District of Columbia, from eight South American countries, from Canada have come 400 able amateurs and professionals, ages 17 to 58, to learn and to [illegible] Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Aaron [illegible], and many other distinguished musicians teach [illegible]



These students do not have to be urged to work. There is a modest castle of brick, sandstone, and oak in Lenox, built by some 1[illegible]th-Century Morgan, that has been converted [illegible] dormitory for men. I vis[illegible] one aftern[illegible] out 5 o'clock. On the first [illegible] piano and some bowed strings were talking things over, on the second floor a shirtless young man, standing between double-deck bunks, was coursing scales on a silver flute; on the top floor, which used to be servants' quarters, a Rhode Island viola and a Rhode Island 'cellist, sitting on their makeshift beds of rough wood, were playing a Beethoven duet. A storm came up, rain blew in at the windows, lightning flared, thunder added its overwhelming bass, but the duet went on.

FROM thickets adjacent to the immense music shed, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays, the sounds of strings, woodwinds and voices rise on piney air. There is a half-dozen small studios in the thickets. . . .

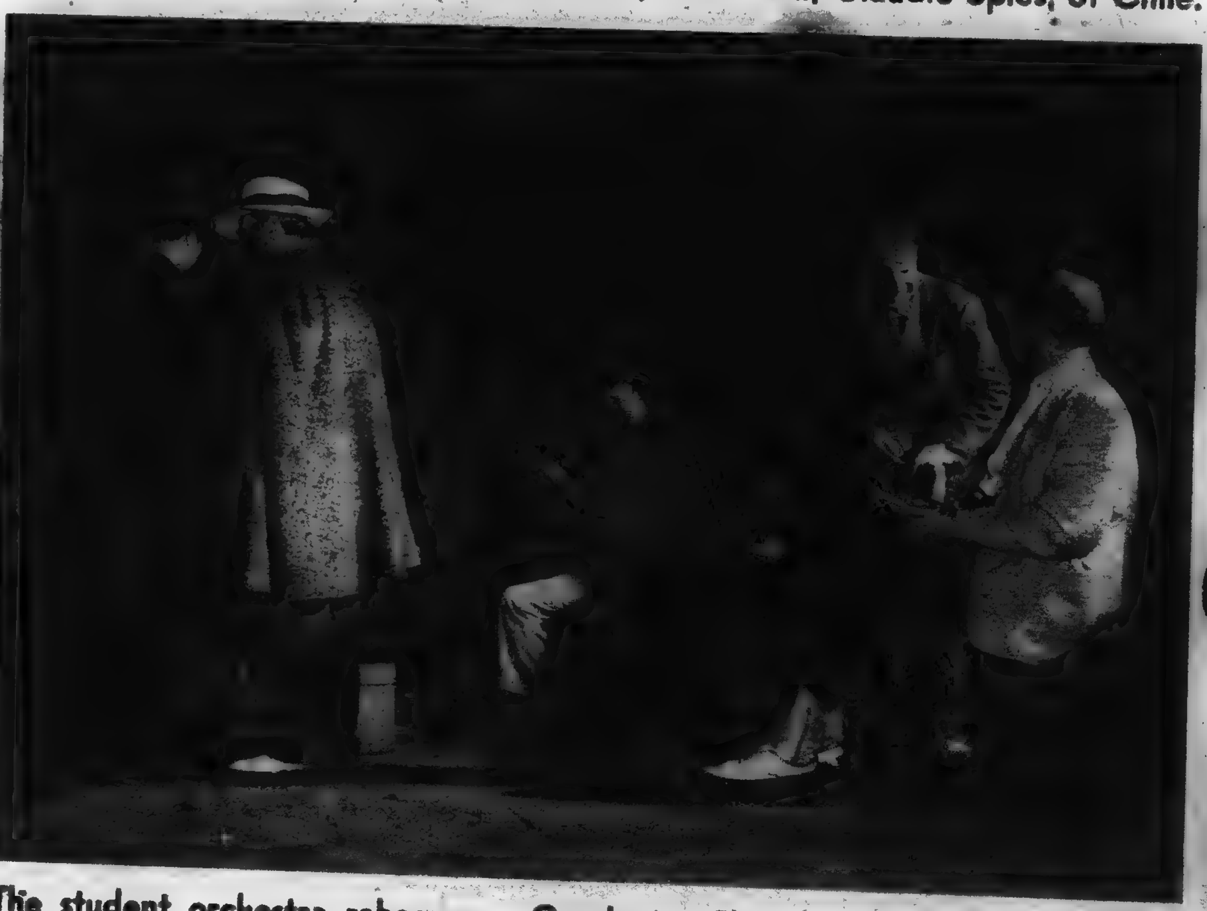
A lone string bass player sits in the morning shade of a maple and practices, near the music shed. Inside, the advanced student orchestra, with a student conductor, tries "The Afternoon of a Faun." How various must be the feelings of a student conductor and student orchestra with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Stanley Chapple sitting on the stage. Dr. Koussevitzky, tweed cape over shoulders and Panama hat in hand, rises to correct a young lady harpist, penetrates among the oboes, croons to the fiddles, bestows a word on the young conductor. High on a steel rafter a nesting bird offers a shrill ostinato that rides above the song of the whole orchestra. . . .

Cows and a horse are feeding, swishing their tails, in the meadows near the red barn. From the barn sounds a men's chorus. The singers sit on benches 'round a piano at the back of the barn. A young man, William Johnson, stands at the piano, playing with the right hand, conducting with the left, as the men work at Brahms' "Alto Rhapsody." Johnson says at one point, "It's got to sound like barbershop harmony, because that's all it is. . . . Let the music reel along; it'll do damn good by itself without you pushing it." Most of the singers are young men, some of whom have been in the service; but there is one man with gray hair. At intermission they smoke and chat outside in the sunlight. . . .

In the Theater-Concert Hall, Putnam Aldrich, Providence harpsichordist, sits on the stage alone, in shirtsleeves, trying to tune his harpsichord before concert time. The strings are affected by damp weather. He tunes them patiently with a small, T-shaped wrench. During a late afternoon thunderstorm, there was too much noise and dampness for tuning, and he has not had time for dinner. The first listeners are just arriving as he finishes. Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, celebrated patron of music, sits in the front row.

Harpsichord, descant viol, treble viol, violone, viola da gamba, old instruments playing old music, of Telemann, Bach, Gibbons, D. Scarlatti, Rameau, Handel, Couperin. One wonders whether it was played so well in its own day. . . .

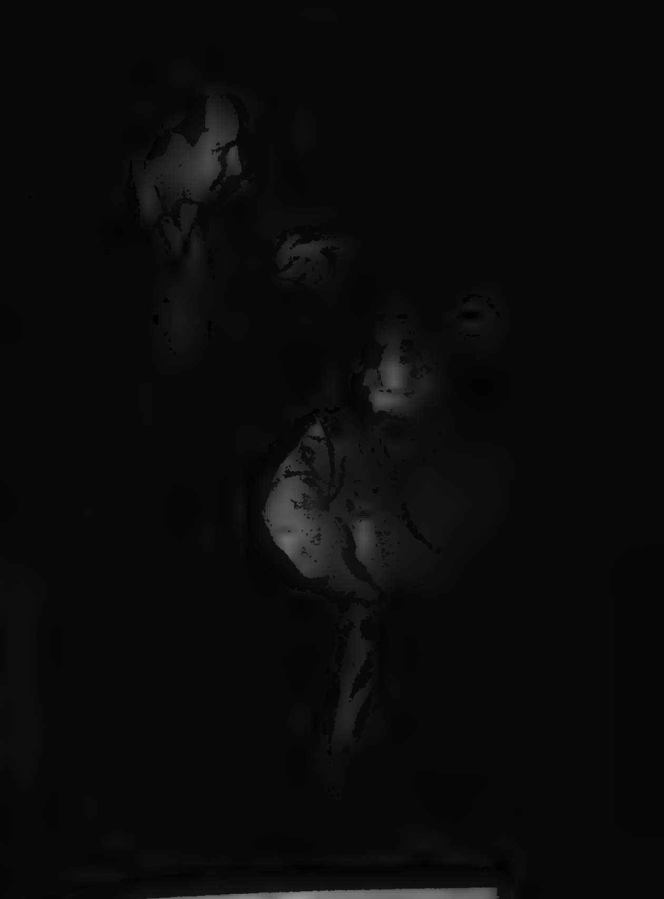
A Beethoven duet receives impromptu performance in a Tanglewood dormitory. The 'cellist is Elmer Tolsted, Brown University instructor in mathematics, the viola Earl L. Hedberg, of Pawtucket. Seated listener is Robert D. Allen, Brown student. Standees: M. Schenkman, New York; Claudio Spies, of Chile.



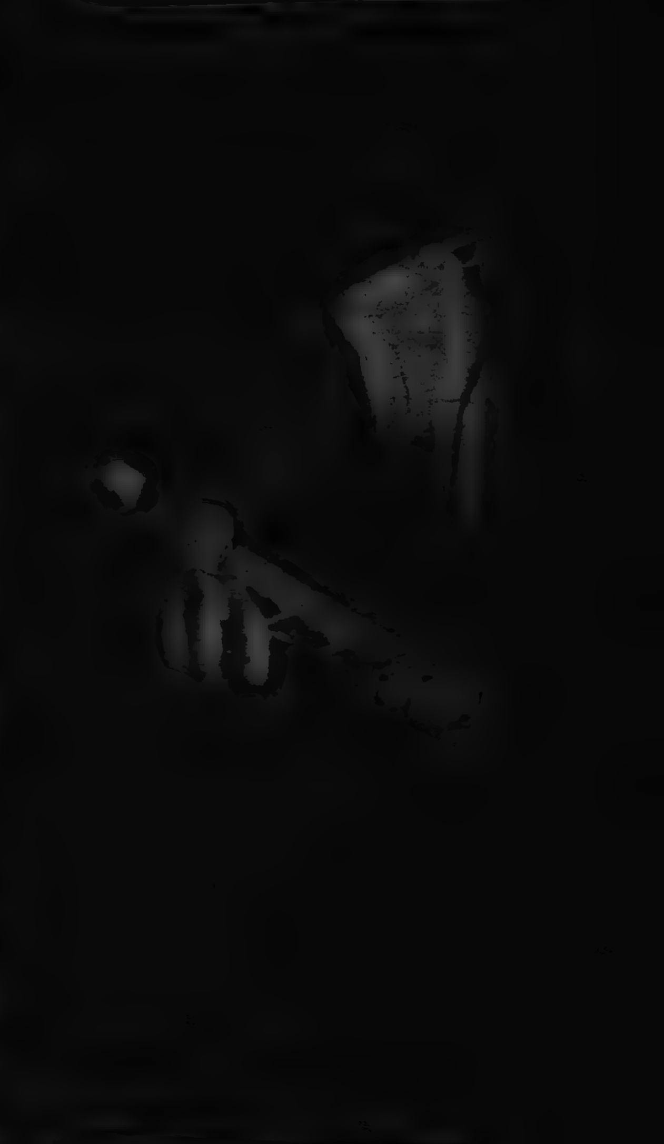
The student orchestra rehearses. Conductor Eleazar de Carvalho of Brazil receives hints from Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (in cape). Mr. Hedberg is playing first viola. Conductor Stanley Chapple (seated), assistant to Dr. Koussevitzky, talks with Louis Speyer, English horn of the Boston Symphony.

'Cellist Allen takes part in a chamber music rehearsal in the old house at Tanglewood. Instructor is Gaston Dufresne, bass, of the Boston Symphony.

The Music Center provides many such [illegible]ral scenes as this. The Red [illegible] blackboard and benches, has been [illegible] from its original uses to bec



[illegible]atthew Lockhart, Providence
[illegible]rancis Barnes, Idaho, rehears
[illegible]iovanni." Boris Goldovsky



Putn[illegible] of Providence tunes his ha a [illegible] concert with the Boston Societ

Matthew Lockhart, Providence bass (center) and Francis Barnes, Idaho, rehearse scene from "Don Giovanni." Boris Goldovsky (on chair) instructs.

Aaron Copland, celebrated American composer, lunching outdoors. Mr. Copland is assistant director of the Center.

Many of the students relax and eat on the beautiful lawns of the estate. The cafeteria bus, in the background, brings soup, ice cream, sandwiches, milk, pie for the noon meal.

Putn of Providence tunes his harpsichord just in time for a ch cert with the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments.

Three students glance at a score. They are (l-r) Nicolette Ysaye, New York, costume designing; Robert Gottlieb, New York, conducting, and Adriana LaZazzera, Springfield, of the opera department.

des many su al scenes as this. The Red Barn, equipped with electric lights, piano, , has been d from its original uses to become a picturesque studio for choral groups.

Under the greenwood tree, James Harnett, Boston, saws away peacefully on the double bass.

HERE'S TANGLEWOOD, the spot in the Berkshires long ago immortalized by Nathaniel Hawthorne in his "Tanglewood Tales," and now the mecca of music lovers of the western hemisphere. Above is the Theatre Concert hall with students awaiting lunch served from a mobile canteen. To the right is the great Music shed seating 6,000 persons and summer home of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Life for the 400 odd music students at Tanglewood is mainly work, little play. The week is one of lectures, concerts, rehearsals and study of stage technique. In the student ensemble is a group from Albany, pictured at the left. Here Thomas Kenny explains the construction of his French horn, a difficult instrument, to his fellow students. In the group (left to right) are Eleanor Lauterborn, clarinetist; Leo Mahigian, violinist; David Bailey, oboeist, all of whom are studying orchestral playing at the Music Center under noted conductors; and Leo D'Alessandro, baritone, and Jean Bowen, dramatic soprano. Both Mr. D'Alessandro and Miss Bowen are in the Opera Workshop at Tanglewood.

The meaning of Tanglewood may best be exemplified by pre-Tanglewood efforts and the resultant enthusiastic crowds as was witnessed Thursday night when the Music Shed was jammed and 2,000 others, including many Albanians, heard the concert while seated on the ground outside the Shed.

Albany may well be proud of its representation in the student aggregation there. It is from such efforts that great musicians of the future arise.

In the years to come Tanglewood is expected to take on additional lustre and at the gates of Albany may come what its backers confidently hope is the music center of the world.

* * *

ewood Music Center"

HIS IS a daily scene at Tanglewood. Here Robert Shaw directs a hearsal of a chorus for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to be sung at final concert, August 11.—Photographs on this page by H. S. Babbit Jr., except as otherwise indicated.

—Photo by Lotte J. Neustein

↑

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (right) director of the Music Center and world famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tanglewood is the result of long and laborious efforts by Dr. Koussevitzky to create in America a center devoted to great music.

EIGHT MUSICIANS from Latin-America lunch with Adolf A. Berle, Jr., former United States ambassador to Brazil, and Mrs. Berle, at their summer home in Great Barrington. Left to right, first row: Eleazar deCarvalho, assistant conductor of the Rio de Janeiro orchestra (Brazil), a student of conducting under Serge Koussevitzky; Miss Merces Silva-Telles, pianist and journalist, a week-end guest; Raul Spivak, Argentine pianist; Juan Orrego, choral conductor from Santiago, Chile; second row: Mr. Berle, Mrs. Alberto Ginastera, Mrs. Estevez, Mrs. Spivak, Mrs. Orrego, Oscar y Buenaventura of Bogota, Colombia; standing: Dr. Alberto Carneiro, Brazilian delegate to United Nations Health Committee; Antonio Jose Estevez of Caracas, Venezuela; Mrs. Berle; Aaron Copland, composer and assistant director of the Center; Mr. Ginastera, one of the best known composers of Buenos Aires, Argentina; Hector Tosar, pianist and composer of Montevideo, Uruguay; Claudio Spies of Santiago, student at New England Conservatory of Music, studying composition.

This Clipping From CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN
JUL 2 8 1946

State Aid to Arts Urged By Musician

By Felix Borowski.

NOW that problems of reconstruction are being met, and, in some cases at least, are in process of solution, the practitioners of the arts are asking themselves: What are the prospects in Europe in the matter of government aid for music, painting, sculpture, literature? Nor are these questions coming up in Europe alone.

When the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center took place at the end of last month, Sergei Koussevitzky, its director, availed himself of the opportunity to urge, in an address, the establishment of American governmental protection for music and the sister arts.

"Our world," said he, "is hungry for spiritual food. But what has been done by the government to satisfy this hunger? Is there a law preventing democratic governments from supporting the fine arts? None of the democratic governments are concerned with this vital question—the subsidy of the arts—especially musical art. Is it not time for this government, leading among democracies, to give a permanent support to the arts?"

Department Needed

Mr. Koussevitzky then went on to declare that "the state is the ground upon which art finds stability and security. It is imperative for the state to realize and acknowledge the signal need of our time. Art needs the support of the state, and demands a department of the fine arts."

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not the first to bring up the matter of a Ministry of Fine Arts at Washington, D.C. Nor is he alone in demanding it. For a number of years Congress has been lending an ear—but nothing more than that—to proposals for such a department. Let it not be believed, however, that the ruling powers in Washington invariably have shrugged a collective shoulder at the notion of taking a protective attitude to the arts.

A little more than 10 years ago the Federal Arts Projects came into existence as part of the Work Projects Administration, and music, painting, ballet, etc., were provided with such liberal encouragement that some 45,000 representatives of them drew monies in the course of three years to the tune of $105,000,000. What had been offered and spent by the time that the Works Project Administration clamped down the lid on its coffers in 1943 must have reached astronomic figures.

While there were critics to insist that no good came out of the Federal Arts Projects, we are convinced that, at least in the case of music and the ballet, great benefits accrued to Chicago and its environs. One will not easily forget the admirable work accomplished by the Illinois Symphony Orchestra when it was supervised by Albert Goldberg.

Never before had native composers and conductors been encouraged as they were by it; seldom had any other symphonic organization provided the public with as much new and interesting music as came to notice at its concerts.

Slight Injustice

Mr. Koussevitzky scarcely did justice to democratic governments when he asked—we presume with some heat—if there was a law preventing them from supporting the fine arts; or when he declared that "they are not concerned with the vital question—the subsidy of the arts." France, for instance, may not at the moment be pouring gold into the exchequer of the Academie Nationale de Musique, the Comedie Francaise, the Opera Comique, the Paris Conservatoire and the Conservatoires of Dijon, Toulouse, Lille, Nancy and other towns, but before the war her budget for them amounted to 132,000,000 francs.

Belgium was not less artistically minded, nor less public-spirited, for she maintained the Orchestre Nationale de Belgique, and on it, and on other musical enterprises, spent 135,000,000 Belgian francs. Even England, which long had been regarded as allergic to music, supports the British Broadcasting Corporation's orchestra, and is doling out funds to other symphonic organizations, and to schools such as the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music.

There is insufficient space to detail the musical generosity of other democratic countries such as Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Switzerland, and even Hungary. Russia has not been included in this sketch, as she scarcely can be termed a democracy, but much could be written about the support Latin-American lands are giving to the arts.

This Clipping From
JACKSON, TENN.
SUN
JUL 2 8 1946

Carol Brice To Be Soloist With The Boston Symphony

An all-Brahms program will b presented on the second WTJS ABC broadcast from the Berkshir Music Festival on Saturday, August 3, at 7:30-8:30 p. m.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the entire Boston Symphon Orchestra, will present Carol Brice contralto, as soloist. Miss Brice wil be heard with a male chorus an the orchestra in Brahms "Rhapsod Op. 53." The concluding numbe will be Brahms' "Symphony Nc 2."

Miss Brice first sang for Dr Koussevitzky in February, 1946 when she was heard by "Th Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." He also heard her via a broadcast on which she was soloist with Frtiz Reiner in De Fall's "El Amor Brujo." This lead to an audition with him and her engagement by the Friends of the Boston Symphony.

A native of Sedalia, N. C., Miss Brice attended Talladega College, where her instructors interested her in a singing career anl suggested the Juilliard School of Music. Coming to New York, she won an audition for a scholarship in 1939. That same year she won a role in auditions for the "Hot Mikado."

While still a student at Juilliard School, Miss Brice won the Walter W. Naumberg Award and a Town Hall recital. Her teachers arranged for Dr. Koussevitzky to hear her and a special concert was held at Pittsfield, near Tanglewood, but Dr. Koussevitzky could not come.

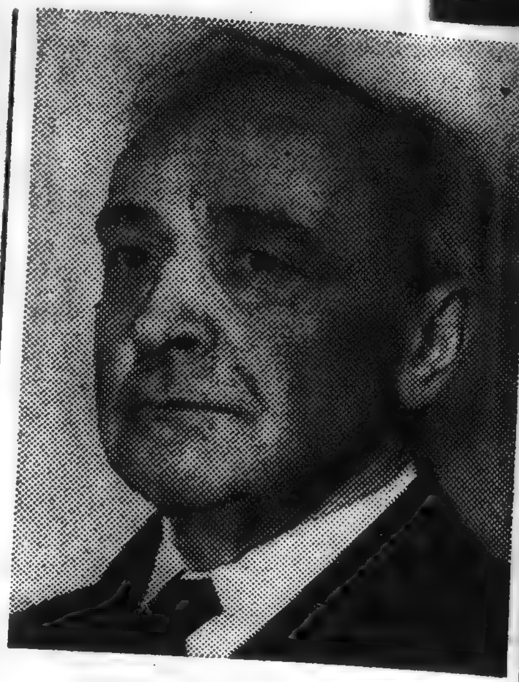
On August 3, however, Miss Brice will reach Tanglewood and sing under the direction of the Boston conductor. Along the way have been appearances with the Pittsburgh Symphony, the Kansas City Philharmonic, the New Haven Symphony, the CBC Symphony, and a transcontinental concert tour

---

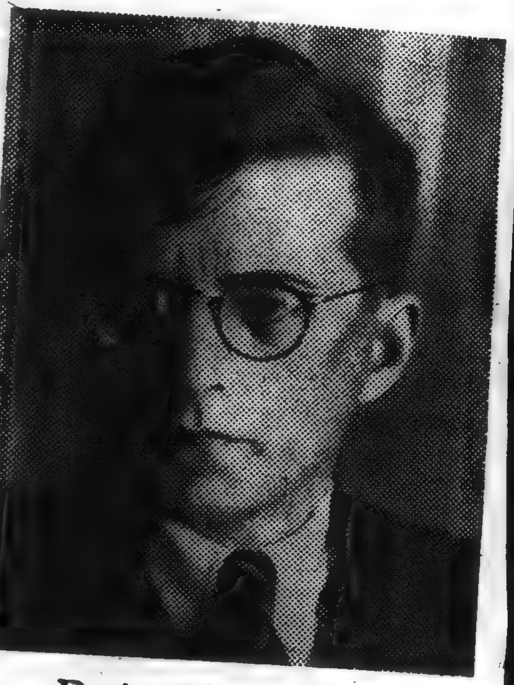
This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM
JUL 2 8 1946

—Hague—

New Shostakovich Work Heard As Berkshire Festival Opens



Serge Koussevitzky
He introduced . . .



Dmitri Shostakovich
. . . his Ninth Symphony

LENOX, Mass.—Tanglewood, once the home of Nathaniel Hawthorne and, since 1937, the site of world-famous Berkshire Symphonic Festivals, again welcomed a host of music-lovers from the Berkshire Hills and points many hundreds of miles distant Thursday evening when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony opened the ninth festival of the series. Resuming after a lapse of four wartime years, this first full-scale session of Summer concerts since 1941 attracted an initial audience of over 6000 who filled every seat in the huge music shed and overflowed onto the lawn, and heard Dr. Koussevitzky conduct a program which featured the American premiere of the Ninth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovich.

The 39-year-old Soviet composer's new symphony, written last Summer after the war in Europe had ended, is not, as might have been expected, a profound and elaborate celebration of victory. Rather it is a release of youthful high spirits, a happy expression of relief. Unlike its two more-than-hour-long, troubled and epical wartime predecesors, the Seventh (or Leningrad) Symphony and the Eighth, it is relatively short—taking less than a half-hour to play—and predominantly joyful and exuberant, simple in outline and almost classical in form. In Shostakovich's own disarming words, uttered after a piano preview of the score last year in Russia, "It is a merry little piece. Musicians will love to play it and critics will delight in blasting it."

It is divided into five movements, the last three played without pause. The opening allegro is gay and light-hearted, offering undisguised homage to Haydn and a slight bow to Prokofieff, and sporting pert, often ribald, little tunes for solo and woodwinds and first violin and brilliant orchestral fixtures that are typically Shostakovian. The second movement, moderato, is lyrical in character, sometimes pastoral and often reflective in mood, with long, wandering, plaintive melodies carried by the woodwinds, singly and in pairs, and more darkly colored passages for the strings. It is appealing, now and again touching, music, though basically sentimental, as becomes more apparent towards the close of the movement.

A short presto—brittle, brisk and almost martial in spirit—leads into a contrasting largo consisting of an expressive solo for the bassoon flanked by fanfares in the brasses—dramatic music punctuated by theatrical pauses, and recalling, perhaps harking back to, the more troubled moods of the Seventh and Eighth Symphonies. The pace quickens again in a spirited finale which gradually builds to a climax of disciplined sound and fury, bringing the work to an exhilarating and sudden end.

One comes away from a first hearing of the new symphony impressed by its simplicity and directness, cheered by its humor and prankish spirits, admiring the clarity and virtuosity of its orchestration, but feeling, nevertheless, a little disappointed and dissatisfied, as if emotionally short-changed. For much of it is music of effect, skilfully contrived, vigorous and good-humored, but essentially superficial and banal. And one suspects that some of its seeming depth and meaning was read into it by Dr. Koussevitzky in performance, and fears to think how some of its more uninspired portions, especially the last movement, might come off if set forth by a less sympathetic and less gifted conductor. In any case, it is notably clever and engaging music that holds one's interest almost continuously, and certainly its first audience seemed to like it. After the delightful first movement, a wave of appreciative laughter and applause swept through the auditorium, and after the finale there was long and hearty hand-clapping.

The Boston Symphony functioned all evening like the expert and beautifully balanced ensemble of players it is. The execution was of a superlative order and the sounds emitted gave continuous aural pleasure. The concert opened with an intensely vital and affecting performance of Beethoven's noble Eroica Symphony, after which the audience recalled Dr. Koussevitsky many times to bow with the orchestra standing behind him. And there were further demonstrations of approval after the Moussorgsky-Ravel Pictures at an Exhibition, which has long been a particular specialty of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians.

The Festival concerts continue this Saturday and Sunday, and on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday of the two weeks following, with a repeat performance of the Shostakovich Ninth scheduled for the session Saturday evening, Aug. 10, to be broadcast nationally over the ABC network.

—ROBERT A. HAGUE.

This Clipping From KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE
JUL 2 8 1946

TANGLEWOOD FROM Hawthorne to Koussevitzky is the subject of "The Tale of Tanglewood: Scene of the Berkshire Music Festivals" (Vanguard), written by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, a Boston Symphony trustee and Pulitzer prize winner, now 82.

It was time for a record of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals and Music Center, and Howe has admirably filled the need. He supplements his interesting story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year, 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so was the Pittsfield-Stockbridge-Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and, above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, ony 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
JUL 28 1946

Music

By Edgar S. Van Olinda

THE first Sunday afternoon concert in the Music Shed at Tanglewood will be held today at 3:30 o'clock, when the Boston Symphony complete orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will offer the following program:

Symphony in A-major ("Italian") .... Mendelssohn
Suit from ballet, "Appalachian Spring" .... Copland
Symphony No. 5 in E-minor .... Tchaikowsky

All reserved seats for the first two week-ends have been sold, but admission tickets to the grounds at $2 each are available to the public, wheer the music may be heard but not seen from the spacious grounds surrounding the open shed.

The Round Lake Concerts committee, representing the Round Lake association and the A. Y. Cornell Memorial fund has two concerts scheduled for the month of August in the association's large auditorium. On Friday evening, Aug. 9, 25 menbers of the Albany Symphony orchestra, directed by Peter Strano, assisted by Dr. Leonard G. Stanley, with Claire Witkowski, coloratura soprano, as guest soloist, will present a program of orchestral numbers. On Aug. 16, the committee will present the famous two-piano team of Whittemore and Lowe. Reservations for tickets may be made to W. Merritt Goddard, Round Lake.

The Colonie Opera guild, John Seagle director, will present Sir Arthur Sullivan's operetta, "Cox and Box," and the third act of Jules Massenet's opera, "Werther," in the Lake George school auditorium, Thursday and Friday nights, Aug. 1 and 2, at 8:45 o'clock. Members of the Seagle colony who will be heard in "Cox and Box" are: Coston Folmer, Robert Bird and Perry Horine. In the scene from "Werther," Helen Spann, Jon Crowe, Robert and Mary Bird will be heard in the leading roles.

The Ernest Williams Music camp at Saugerties will present a program of light classics this afternoon at 3 o'clock. Featured guest artists will be Dorothy Parker of Woodstock, who will play the Grieg piano concerto with the camp orchestra, conducted by Englebert Roentgen. Tre second part of the program will include the Camp dance band and swing choir in a program titled "Typical Studio Broadcast." More than 160 students will participate. The concert is open to the public free of charge.

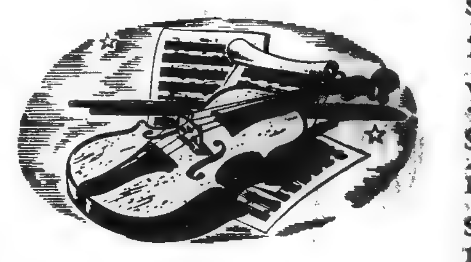
Neither the sun nor the moon sets in the summer at the North Pole.

THINK
NEW YORK CITY
JUL - 1946

A Messenger of Understanding

The part played by music, especially in the summer months, as a unifying influence in a world of many distractions.

MUSIC, like drama, painting and the other arts, is doing its share in interpreting human emotions and aspirations in a world striving for the attainment of mutual understanding. In schools and summer camps scattered over the country, its "universal language" is conveying to many thousands of students and their audiences a sense of the ideals cherished by great composers of various nationalities in the past and present.



At Tanglewood in the Berkshires, in the session opening this month, there will be nine concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by its leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, including a Brahms Festival and the performance of symphonic music ranging from the classics to contemporary works. There will also be the first American performance of Benjamin Britten's opera Peter Grimes. Dr. Koussevitzky envisions the time when the greatest artists, painters, writers, actors and musicians may live together for a few weeks of the summer and make their message felt in the world.

* * *

AT the Norfolk Music School of Yale University, Norfolk, Connecticut, which has in its enrollment students not only from our various states, but also from South American countries, Canada and China, classes in poetry and art and folk dancing supplement the musical courses.

An interesting feature in the program of the Juilliard Summer School, New York City, is instruction in the interpretation of French songs from Lully to Ravel by the celebrated English soprano Maggie Teyte. This singer may speak with authority, since she studied with Claude Debussy three hours a day for nine months.

At Joplin, Missouri, is the recently formed Junior-Civic Orchestra which is featuring American composers. At East Brewster, Massachusetts, instruction in music and ballet is given to boys and girls in the 'teen ages; and in Stowe, Vermont, for students of such ages, the Trapp family, which some years ago came from southern Austria, has its annual summer school in the art of living, with special emphasis on music.

Dependence on music to speak a language understood by all is seen in the efforts of what is called the nation's youngest symphony orchestra to carry its message to the world. This organization is the product of the National Music Camp at Interlochen, Michigan, which opens its nineteenth season at the beginning of July. Many of the students at this camp are ex-GIs who often sent small contributions after hearing some of the broadcasts of the school's orchestra.

* * *

PERHAPS the most striking instance of the unifying influence of music, so far as this country is concerned, is to be found in the arrangements which have been made for a tour of eight weeks by the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra next autumn. Sixty concerts will be given in some thirty cities of America and Canada, including New York and Boston. Time was when the East spoke the language of symphonic music and the West listened. In 1915 the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Karl Muck, gave a series of concerts at the San Francisco Exposition. Now the West returns the compliment. In a different medium West is to meet East, as it did when the railroad spanned the continent.

9500 Attend Sunday Berkshire Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, July 28.—The last concert in the first series of the Berkshire Festival was played this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. There was an audience of 9500 which filled the shed to its 6000 capacity and extended far out on the surrounding grounds.

Tanglewood was at its scenic best and for the third time this week the occasion was favored with perfect weather.

These are but two of the many reasons why some 30,000 spectators have come to Tanglewood during the past week to hear this wonderful music. This figure, by the way, does not include the thousands who have also attended the public rehearsals, as well as the lectures and the students' activities.

Three Symphonic Works

This afternoon's program included three symphonic works—Mendelssohn's "Symphony in A Major, No. 4, Opus 90" (Italian), Aaron Copland's suite from the ballet "Appalachian Spring" and Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, Opus 64."

The pre-intermission portion consisted of the first two works named—as varied a diet as you can imagine. The cool airiness of the Mendelssohn music was delightfully amiable preparation for Coplan's and Tschaikowsky's emotional and tonal involvements

Koussevitsky's concern for detailed treatment in a score as disarming as the "Italian Symphony" continues to be reason for admiration. Quite apart from accepted requirements, he derives the maximum effect from every phrase.

Again we speak with special regard of the string section to which Mendelssohn assigned so much of his singing melody. It should be added that the tonal blemishes committed by the brass section at the two preceding evening concerts were more than compensated for particularly in the opening movement of the Mendelssohn symphony.

COPLAND BALLET

The suite from the ballet "Appalachian Spring" is another typical Aaron Copland score. Incidentally it not only won the Pulitzer prize but also the award of the music critics' circie of New York.

Briefly the story concerns the fears wrought in a newly-married couple by neighbors and a passing revivalist and his followers. The scene is a newly-built farmhouse in the hills of Pennsylvania during the early part of the last century.

With this sketchy theme to guide you and the fact that the music itself inspired Martha Graham choreography, it assumes a full measure of coherence only temporarily toward the end of the work when the composer "borrows" a simple Shaker theme. Throughout it indulges freely in the technics of the modern "isms" in conveying the tale. Since its melodic pursuits wander even more widely than in the new Shostakovich "Ninth Symphony," there is a strong inclination on the part of the more staunch conservatives to regard this score as excellent background for some Grade B movie.

The orchestra and conductor were, as usual, in their element with Tschaikowsky's sweeping declarations in his "Fifth Symphony." Virtually every note is wrung of its full power by Koussevitzky, and Tschaikowsky's music having the universal meaning that it has, the audience did its best to express hearty endorsement.

This series will be resumed next Thursday evening, with concerts on the following Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 28 1946

List Is Soloist For Bostonians At Tanglewood

Plays Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto; Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Is Performed

By Francis D. Perkins

LENOX, Mass., July 27.—Familiar music was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening in the music shed at Tanglewood in the second concert of the Berkshire Festival. Serge Koussevitzky, who had celebrated his seventy-second birthday yesterday, began his program with a work appropriate to Tanglewood's rural setting, Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. Eugene List was the soloist in Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto, and the program closed with the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," a work which provides one of the most effective illustrations of this remarkable orchestra's virtuosity.

This morning Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra passed three hours in a final rehearsal of parts of today's and tomorrow afternoon's programs. The public is admitted to these Saturday morning festival rehearsals and the admission fees go to the orchestra's pension fund. Good weather and the opportunity to watch the conductor and orchestra at work under less formal conditions brought out an audience of 3,000 persons.

The first part of the rehearsal was devoted to Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony, which closes tomorrow's program, and the storm music and finale from the pastoral symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky stopped the orchestra every now and then to go over some point of emphasis in phrasing, but in the standard of performance and expressive intensity of the playing this was virtually a concert. Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Spring Suite," which will also be played tomorrow, was rehearsed after the intermission. This is one of the three American works in this festival program.

Beethoven's storm music may have reminded some of the musicians of the famous storm at Tanglewood nine summers ago. The competing noise of rain and thunder had nearly halted the night's concert and Dr. Koussevitzky insisted upon a building for future festivals. The music shed, opened in 1938, was the result of this insistence.

Music was also heard at Tanglewood in the afternoon, when Robert Shaw conducted a Berkshire Music Center chorus in Norman Dello Joio's "Mystic Trumpeter," Frances Poulenc's "Petites Voix," and Brahms's "Liebeslieder" waltzes.

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN

JUL 28 1946

WITH THOUSANDS in the Berkshires for the Festival in Tanglewood (between Lenox and Stockbridge), music lovers are greeting each other over the week-end, comparing notes on the three programs which opened Thursday night in the Music Center Shed, Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony. Opening concert Thursday night attracted approximately 8,000 to hear the American premiere of the Shostakovitch Ninth Symphony and the Beethoven "[illegible]" Last night was devoted to Beethoven, Rachmaninoff and Ravel. Eugene List, young American pianist, played Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 2 in C Minor, Opus 18. Other symphonic offering was the Ravel "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet (Second Suite).

Eugene List

THIS AFTERNOON'S PROGRAM will include the Mendelssohn Symphony No. 4 in A Major (Italiain), the Suite from Copland's "Appalachian Spring," and the Schumann Symphony No. 2 in C Major, Opus 61. Next Thursday night, Aug. 1, marks beginning of Brahms Week with concerts Saturday night, Aug. 3, and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 4. The Festival closes Aug. 8, Aug. 10-11.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUL 28 1946

SOLOIST with the Boston Symphony on the Berkshire Festival broadcast to be heard over WFCI Saturday night will be Carol Brice, contralto.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 28 1946

Brahms Is Featured In Berkshire Festival

Boston Symphony Continues Series at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will give the third concert of the Berkshire Festival in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., this afternoon at 3:30 (Daylight Saving Time). The program includes Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Copland's "Appalachian Spring" suite and Schumann's second symphony. The programs for next Thursday and Saturday nights, Aug. 1 and 3, at 8:15 and next Sunday afternoon, Aug. 4, will be devoted to works of Brahms, as follows:

Thursday: Tragic Overture; Piano Concerto in D minor (Claudio Arrau), Symphony No. 4.

Saturday: Symphony No. 3; Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra (contralto solo, Carol Brice); Symphony No. 2.

Sunday: Haydn Variations; Double concerto for violin and cello (Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky); Symphony No. 1.

The orchestra will hold a public rehearsal next Saturday morning.

The Berkshire Music Center will present the following events this week at Tanglewood:

Today, morning, chamber music concert; Monday evening, chamber music and madrigals; Tuesday evening, Center Orchestra (Dept. V); Wednesday evening, Opera Workshop, opera scenes; Thursday afternoon, Center Orchestra (Dept. V); Friday evening, Center Orchestra (Dept. II); Saturday afternoon, choral concert.

Benjamin Britten's opera "Peter Grimes" will have its first American performances on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, Aug. 6, 7 and 9, at Tanglewood in the Center's theater-concert hall. Inquiries about tickets and admission for these events is obtainable at Tanglewood (telephone Lenox 30).

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

JUL 28 1946

SATURDAY: Carol Brice, contralto, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky perform Brahms Alto Rhapsody, which Blanche Thebom and the Dallas Symphony Orchestra under Antal Dorati will present here next season.

NEW YORK CITY
JUL - 1946

A Messenger of Understanding

The part played by music, especially in the summer months, as a unifying influence in a world of many distractions.

MUSIC, like drama, painting and the other arts, is doing its share in interpreting human emotions and aspirations in a world striving for the attainment of mutual understanding. In schools and summer camps scattered over the country, its "universal language" is conveying to many thousands of students and their audiences a sense of the ideals cherished by great composers of various nationalities in the past and present.

At Tanglewood in the Berkshires, in the session opening this month, [illegible] will be nine concerts by the B[illegible]mphony Orchestra, con[illegible] by its leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, including a Brahms Festival and the performance of symphonic music ranging from the classics to contemporary works. There will also be the first American performance of Benjamin Britten's opera Peter Grimes. Dr. Koussevitzky envisions the time when the greatest artists, painters, writers, actors and musicians may live together for a few weeks of the summer and make their message felt in the world.

* * *

AT the Norfolk Music School of Yale University, Norfolk, Connecticut, which has in its enrollment students not only from our various states, but also from South American countries, Canada and China, classes in poetry and art and folk dancing supplement the musical courses.

An interesting feature in the program of the Juilliard Summer School, New York City, is instruction [illegible] the interpretation of French songs from Lully to Ravel by the celebrated English soprano Maggie Teyte. This singer may speak with authority, since she studied with Claude Debussy three hours a day for nine months.

At Joplin, Missouri, is the recently formed Junior-Civic Orchestra which is featuring American composers. At East Brewster, Massachusetts, instruction in music and ballet is given to boys and girls in the 'teen ages, and in Stowe, Vermont, for students of such ages, the Trapp family, which some years ago came from southern Austria, has its annual summer school in the art of living, with special emphasis on music.

Dependence on music to speak a language understood by all is seen in the efforts of what is called the nation's youngest symphony orchestra to carry its message to the world. This organization is the product of the National Music Camp at Interlochen, Michigan, which opens its nineteenth season at the beginning of July. Many of the students at this camp are ex-GIs who often sent small contributions after hearing some of the broadcasts of the school's orchestra.

* * *

PERHAPS the most striking instance of the unifying influence of music, so far as this country is concerned, is to be found in the arrangements which have been made for a tour of eight weeks by the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra next autumn. Sixty concerts will be given in some thirty cities of America and Canada, including New York and Boston. Time was when the East spoke the language of symphonic music and the West listened. In 1915 the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Karl Muck, gave a series of concerts at the San Francisco Exposition. Now the West returns the compliment. In a different medium West is to meet East, as it did when the railroad spanned the continent.

9500 Attend Sunday Berkshire Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, July 28.—The last concert in the first series of the Berkshire Festival was played this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. There was an audience of 9500 which filled the shed to its 6000 capacity and extended far out on the surrounding grounds.

Tanglewood was at its scenic best and for the third time this week the occasion was favored with perfect weather.

These are but two of the many reasons why some 30,000 spectators have come to Tanglewood during the past week to hear this wonderful music. This figure, by the way, does not include the thousands who have also attended the public rehearsals, as well as the lectures and the students' activities.

Three Symphonic Works

This afternoon's program included three symphonic works—Mendelssohn's "Symphony in A Major, No. 4, Opus 90" (Italian), Aaron Copland's suite from the ballet "Appalachian Spring" and Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, Opus 64."

The pre-intermission portion consisted of the first two works named—as varied a diet as you can imagine. The cool airiness of the Mendelssohn music was delightfully amiable preparation for Coplan's and Tschaikowsky's emotional and tonal involvements.

Koussevitzky's concern for detailed treatment in a score as disarming as the "Italian Symphony" continues to be reason for admiration. Quite apart from accepted requirements, he derives the maximum affect from every phrase.

Again we speak with special regard of the string section to which Mendelssohn assigned so much of his singing melody. It should be added that the tonal blemishes committed by the brass section at the two preceding evening concerts were more than compensated for particularly in the opening movement of the Mendelssohn symphony.

COPLAND BALLET

The suite from the ballet "Appalachian Spring" is another typical Aaron Copland score. Incidentally it not only won the Pulitzer prize but also the award of the music critics' circle of New York.

Briefly the story concerns the fears wrought in a newly-married couple by neighbors and a passing revivalist and his followers. The scene is a newly-built farmhouse in the hills of Pennsylvania during the early part of the last century.

With this sketchy theme to guide you and the fact that the music itself inspired Martha Graham choreography, it assumes a full measure of coherence only temporarily toward the end of the work when the composer "borrows" a simple Shaker theme. Throughout it indulges freely in the technics of the modern "isms" in conveying the tale. Since its melodic pursuits wander even more widely than in the new Shostakovich "Ninth Symphony," there is a strong inclination on the part of the more staunch conservatives to regard this score as [illegible] background for some G[illegible] movie.

The orchestra and conductor were, as usual, in their [illegible] with Tschaikowsky's [illegible] declarations in his "Fifth Symphony." Virtually every note is wrung of its full power by Koussevitzky, and Tschaikowsky's music having the universal meaning that it has, the audience did its best to express hearty endorsement.

This series [illegible] be resumed next Thursday evening, with concerts on the following Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon.

List Is Soloi[illegible] For Bostoni[illegible] At Tanglewo[illegible]

Plays Rachmaninoff [illegible] Concerto; Beetho[illegible] 'Pastoral' Is Perfo[illegible]

By Francis D. Pe[illegible]

LENOX, Mass., July 27.—[illegible] miliar music was played by [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] evening in the music [illegible] Tanglewood in the second con[illegible] of the Berkshire Festival. [illegible] Koussevitzky, who had celebra[illegible] his seventy-second birthday [illegible] terday, began his program [illegible] work appropriate to Tangle[illegible] rural setting, Beethoven's [illegible] toral" symphony. Eugene List [illegible] the soloist in Rachmaninoff's [illegible] ond piano concerto, and the [illegible] gram closed with the second [illegible] from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis [illegible] Chloe," a work which provi[illegible] of the most effective illust[illegible] of this remarkable orchestra's [illegible]

This morning Dr. Koussevi[illegible] and the orchestra passed [illegible] in a final rehearsal of [illegible] day's and tomorrow [illegible] programs. The public is [illegible] to these Saturday morn[illegible] rehearsals and the [illegible] go to the orchestra's [illegible] Good weather and [illegible] opportunity to watch the conduc[illegible] tor and orchestra at work unde[illegible] less formal conditions brought o[illegible] an audience of [illegible],000 persons.

The first part of the rehears[illegible] was devoted to Tchaikovsky's [illegible] symphony, which closes tomorrow's program, and the storm music [illegible] finale from the pastoral sym[illegible] phony. Dr. Koussevitzky stopped the orchestra every now and then to go over some point of emph[illegible] in phrasing, but in the stand[illegible] of performance and expressive in[illegible] tensity of the playing this w[illegible] virtually a concert. Aaron Cop[illegible] land's "Appalachian Spring Suite," which will also be played tomorrow, was rehearsed after the intermis[illegible] sion. This is one of the [illegible] American works in this festi[illegible] program.

Beethoven's storm music [illegible] have reminded some of the musi[illegible] cians of the famous storm [illegible] Tanglewood nine summers ago. The competing noise of rain and thunder had nearly halted [illegible] night's concert and Dr. Kouss[illegible] vitzky insisted upon a building [illegible] future festivals. The music s[illegible] opened in 1938, was the result [illegible] this insistence.

Music was also heard at Tangle[illegible] wood in the afternoon, when [illegible] ert Shaw conducted a B[illegible] Music Center chorus in [illegible] Dello Joio's "Mystic Trump[illegible] Frances Poulenc's "Petites [illegible] and Brahms's "Liebeslieder" waltzes.

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN

JUL 28 1946

WITH THOUSANDS in the Berkshires for the Festival in Tanglewood (between Lenox and Stockbridge), music lovers are greeting each other over the week-end, comparing notes on the three programs which opened Thursday night in the Music Center Shed, Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony. Opening concert Thursday night attracted approximately 8,000 to hear the American premiere of the Shostakovitch Ninth Symphony and the Beethoven [illegible]. Last night was devoted to Beethoven, Rachmaninoff and Ravel. Eugene List, young American pianist, played Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 2 in C Minor, Opus 18. Other symphonic offering was the Ravel "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet (Second Suite).

Eugene List

THIS AFTERNOON'S PROGRAM will include the Mendelssohn Symphony No. 4 in A Major (Italiain), the Suite from Copland's "Appalachian Spring," and the Schumann Symphony No. 2 in C Major, Opus 61. Next Thursday night, Aug. 1, marks beginning of Brahms Week with concerts Saturday night, Aug. 3, and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 4. The Festival closes Aug. 8, Aug. 10-11.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

SOLOIST with the Boston Symphony on the Berkshire Festival [illegible] to be heard over WFCI Saturday night will be Carol Brice, contralto.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 28

Brahms Is Featured In Berkshire Festival

Boston Symphony Continues Series at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will give the third concert of the Berkshire Festival in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., this afternoon at 3:30 (Daylight Saving Time). The program includes Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Copland's "Appalachian Spring" suite and Schumann's second symphony. The programs for next Thursday and Saturday nights, Aug. 1 and 3, at 8:15 and next Sunday afternoon, Aug. 4, will be devoted to works of Brahms, as follows:

Thursday: Tragic Overture; Piano Concerto in D minor (Claudio Arrau); Symphony No. 4.
Saturday: Symphony No. 3; Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra (contralto solo, Carol Brice); Symphony No. 2.
Sunday: Haydn Variations; Double concerto for violin and cello (Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky); Symphony No. 1.

The orchestra will hold a public rehearsal next Saturday morning.

The Berkshire Music Center will present the following events this week at Tanglewood:

Today, morning, chamber music concert; Monday evening, chamber music and madrigals; Tuesday evening, Center Orchestra (Dept. V); Wednesday evening, Opera Workshop, opera scenes; Thursday afternoon, Center Orchestra (Dept. V); Friday evening, Center Orchestra (Dept. II); Saturday afternoon, choral concert.

Benjamin Britten's opera "Peter Grimes" will have its first American performances on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, Aug. 6, 7 and 9, at Tanglewood in the Center's theater-concert hall. Inquiries about tickets and admission for these events is obtainable at Tanglewood (telephone Lenox

---

This Clipping From DALLAS

SATURDAY: Carol [illegible] tralto, and the Boston [illegible] Orchestra under Serge [illegible] ky perform Brahms' [illegible] dy, which Blanche Thebom [illegible] Dallas Symphony Orchestra [illegible] Antal Dorati will present [illegible] season.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

The last fanfares have died away, lost their force in the brisk Berkshire air: the Berkshire Festival is over. It was as everyone knows, the Festival's first post-war season—which is to say that it was (and is) the only American shindig of its kind of any importance. Its eminent successfulness goes without question; the organization having had the enthusiasm, and business foresight to attend even to such picayune matters as paving roads and parking lot spaces.

Music Business' on the spot reporter, that perla fina Miriam de Kika, saw everyone; heard everything going on there. The editors think her record of the season unique in more than many respects. The following is a careful condensation of her work there—a valuable musical-sociological account of America's Own Festival.

Berkshire Letter

July 17, 1946.

Cher Maitre:

At last I am settled! The Portals of Tanglewood have swung wid and I've been greeted like minor nobility—though, to say the truth, that is the only kind I've seen here. Lectures, classes, rehearsals, and concerts, are all mine. Today, I lunched (to prove my point), with Bernstein, Goldowsky, and Blitzstein. Blitzstein was visiting for the day; he and Bernstein sunned themselves on the lawn. Goldowsky is full of brave ideas about opera, and stage direction. You can best follow the gist of them by these excerpts of conversation between S. Koussevitsky and B. Goldowsky: B. G.: "I'd like to see what would happen if we treated singers like artists instead of animals." S. K.: "Do you think we can?" B. G.: "I don't know, but if so, Tanglewood is the only place it can be done."

What atmosphere! What enthusiasm! Boys fiddling away under the apple tree; orchestras rehearsing in cowsheds; madrigals in garages; youth and music everywhere.

A luscious red-head asks for an introduction to our "heart-breaker dept.", Leonard Bernstein.

"Why, of course."

The Bach-Mozart concerts have been very well done. Dr. K. being complimented on them. replied, "They're good composers!"

And while I was at the Administration Offices the other day, Koussevitsky came in dressed: in white flannel trousers; white and green striped sport coat; white beret; white woolen scarf; and white gloves. Quel bel attire!

Robert Shaw at the Boat House, running his chorus through Bach's "Christ Lag"; fishing tackle, sail boats, and Shaw in dungarees.

As you know, Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," is to provide THE sensation this summer. Fact is, Dr. Graf has left, and will not stage the opera; Eric Crozier (the original stager) is coming from England to take over. (By the way, Frances Yeend, to sing one of the principal roles, has silky blond tresses, down to her—down to the middle of her back. Saw them in the Ladies').

Last night's Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Concert (by the Krall Quartet) was adequate; I thought the quartet lacked integration. They were best on Haydn, bad on Beethoven, and interesting on the Prokofiev Quartet. The flippantly witty Prokofiev was unfortunately missing.

July 24, 1946.

Cher Maitre:

If this "Peter Gripes" business doesn't stop soon, I shall be forced to pay out $15, to read the full score. As it is, I've had to buy the libretto, so piqued have I been.

It is raining today.

I am overwhelmed by the tremendous amount of activity going on around here: Tanglewood; Jacob's Pillow—where I saw some arty dancing, and a real horror of a Wagner performance directed by Friedelind Wagner—; South Mountain Association, etc. And, of course, theatre "art" sprouts like mushrooms (the poisonous kind).

John Lessard, a Nadia Boulanger pupil, is one of the more interesting young composers around; it's rumoured that Bernstein may play his Violin Concerto at City Center.

At an Opera Workshop concert, heard that Krall girl, who has everything it takes for success; good-looking and a magnificent voice. By the way, she turned out to be the red-head who wanted to meet Bernstein!

Three youngsters — conducting proteges of Koussevitsky—did their stuff the next night, though I'd say they have mighty little of it. Whilst sunning myself on the raft at the Lake House, I had overheard one of these "future conductors" say: "I've finally found out how Bernstein does it." To be exact it was little X . . . Z . . . He conducted the dullest performance of the three.

BRITTEN, KOUSSEVITSKY: "Peter Grimes," parent and god-parent.

I haven't said anything so far about Eleazar de Carvalho; shall write a separate story about him. He shouldn't be mentioned in the same breath with the other proteges. If it hadn't been for his extraordinarily forceful leadership, the "Emperor" Concerto that night would have gone completely astray; he got a real ovation.

Martinu, whose Piano Quintet was performed this morning, has had tough luck. A few days ago, right after luncheon, he stepped off a little terrace adjoining the dining-room, thereby breaking every rib in his poor body. But he is slowly recuperating from brain concussion, and will be all right.

Last, but certainly not least, the wall-paper in the ladies' room at Tracy Hall (men's dorm) is decidedly Berkshire - Music - Center: lutes and fleur-de-lys, in alternating pattern!

BLITZSTEIN, BERNSTEIN: Berkshire visitor and his levitating host.

August 15, 1946.

Cher Maitre:

You must understand by this time that Tanglewood means Koussevitsky, Bernstein, and Britten (his "Peter Snipes"). But there are other great names about, too. Two young ones at the school whose names will interest you are the little Joachim boy (Brahms' friend, the violinist), and Mlle. Ysaye (another violinist's relative).

Getting it off my chest quickly, I will say this: that the Shostakovitch Ninth Symphony has come and gone. An eminently shallow work. People here were disappointed: seems they expected something much different, "greater," etc.

Britten has arrived, at last. But, before I forget, I want to mention another star student, a Curtis product called Nathan Goldstein. He played the Tchaikowsky Violin Concerto [illegible] with such beautiful, beautiful [illegible] everyone gasped.

It occurs to me that I've said nothing yet (except for the Shostakovitch) about Koussevitsky's own concert series. Perhaps that's because I took their splendidness for granted. However, the Brahms programs were particularly fine, perhaps the most inspiring of all. I think bad programming was responsible for part of the let-down of the last concert; it ended, for some strange reason, with Tchaikowsky's "1812 Overture"! I don't think there's much point in mentioning other facts or impressions about this series, which must already have filtered their way down to you.

Now, I had nearly forgotten about "Peter Grimes" . . . can you imagine, when this whole place has gone nutty because of it. Here is the picture. Lenny didn't seem too happy about it at the very beginning. Neither did Britten or Crozier. Then came the first dress-rehearsal; everyone stayed up all night in the freezing shed. The intricacies of the music, of course, were enormous. Add to these the difficulties of a student production . . . Well, it was too bad of K. to have announced the opera as second to "Carmen." I think it's an ungrateful work; at times, forceful . . . I confess very little of it came through to me, and certainly there's no whole cloth about it—all this in spite of the good Berkshirites who were determined to be overwhelmed. I have been amused to see that no other accounts of the opera have dared to say this: that it lacks completeness, or musically-human feeling. But more of this when I return.

Amicalement,

Miriam de Kika.

Berkshire Eagle July 27

Second Section

Koussevitzky and Players Invited to Electrics' Game

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra have invitations to the Pittsfield-Amsterdam game at Wahconah Park Monday night and, as far as President Paul A. Tamburello of the baseball club is concerned, the maestro doesn't have to bring his baton and the musicians can leave their instruments at Tanglewood. Formal attire is not required.

The ball club is just being the good neighbor, according to the invitation letter of Tamburello to Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra.

Tamburello's Letter

Tamburello's letter to Cabot follows:

I see by The Eagle that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in Berkshire for a three-week stand. It has also been pointed out to me that of the nine engagements for which your club is booked at Tanglewood, only on three occasions are there conflicts in dates with the public entertainment enterprise of which I have the honor to be president.

As a mark of appreciation, therefore, for the co-operation between the two clubs, I should like, on behalf of the Pittsfield Professional Baseball Corporation, through you, to invite Dr. Koussevitzky and the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be the guests of the club at Wahconah Park on Monday night, July 29, at 8. At this time the Pittsfield Electrics will play the Amsterdam Rugmakers in a regularly scheduled Canadian-American League baseball game.

While inferentially I am not making invidious comparisons between the talent represented in your field of endeavor, which I understand to be strictly major league, and that represented by the Pittsfield Electrics, which is only potentially so, I am rather sure that Maestro Rensa's boys would furnish Maestro Koussevitzky's men with an enjoyable evening of sport.

We should not, of course, expect the orchestra men to play.

Noiseless Programs

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

The crackling of papers caused by fumbling with programs and digging for candies in paper bags disturbs the required silence during our Tanglewood concerts. The same annoyance can be experienced every day in any of our cinemas.

There is a simple remedy for this pestiferous performance. A great number of years ago (the writer is well beyond voting age) I attended the world-famous Salzburg concerts and the equally famous Wagnerian plays at Bayreuth. The elaborate multi-page programs handed out in these halls are what I would call "noiseless" programs. They are printed on a sort of blotting paper. No matter how you fumble, thumb or crush these programs, not a sound is heard. It is merely a question of selecting an unsized paper to print the program on.

In our Berkshire paper center this should cause no problem at all. Candy bags could be made of the same kind of paper. Not so easy would be the solution of noiseless peanut shells, a standard disturbance in movie houses.

ARTHUR PALME.

Pittsfield.

Aug 1

[215]

This Clipping From
HENDERSONVILLE, N. C.
TIMES NEWS

AUG 1 - 1946

On August 4, at Tanglewood, at the Berkshire festival, one of the few surviving perfect violincelli made by Stradivari, the fabulous 250 - year - old "Lord Aylesford," will make its concert debut. It will be introduced by its new owner, Gregor Piatigorsky, who acquired it a few weeks ago at a price not disclosed but rumored to have been unusually high.

"The "Lord Aylesford" was made by Antonio Stradivari in Cremona in 1696. According to careful calculations, of all the instruments made by Stradivari, 540 violins, 12 violas and 50 'celli are actually known today.

Of the 'celli, fewer than 10 are in perfect condition. Of these, the "Lord Aylesford" is considered by experts to be one of the finest. The instrument was brought from Italy to London in 1780, where it was bought by Lord Aylesford. Later it passed into other private hands.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

The last fanfares have died away, [illegible] their force in the brisk Berkshire air: the Berkshire Festival is over. It was as everyone knows, the Festival's first post-war season—which is to say that it was (and is) the only American shindig of its kind of any importance. Its eminent successfulness goes without question; the organization having had the enthusiasm, and business foresight to attend even to such picayune matters as paving roads and parking lot spaces.

Music Business' on the spot reporter, that perla fina Miriam de Kika, saw everyone; heard everything going on there. The editors think her record of the season unique in more than many respects. The following is a careful condensation of her work there—a valuable musical-sociological account of America's Own Festival.

Berkshire Letter

July 17, 1946.

Cher Maitre:

At last I am settled! The Portals of Tanglewood have swung wid and I've been greeted like minor nobility—though, to say the truth, that is the only kind I've seen here. Lectures, classes, rehearsals, and concerts, are all mine. Today, I lunched (to prove my point), with Bernstein, Goldowsky, and Blitzstein. Blitzstein was visiting for the day; he and Bernstein sunned themselves on the lawn. Goldowsky is full of brave ideas about opera, and stage direction. You can best follow the gist of them by these excerpts of conversation between S. Koussevitsky and B. Goldowsky: B. G.: "I'd like to see what would happen if we treated singers like artists instead of animals." S. K.: "Do you think we can?" B. G.: "I don't know, but if so, Tanglewood is the only place it can be done."

What atmosphere! What enthusiasm! Boys fiddling away under the apple tree; orchestras rehearsing in cowsheds; madrigals in garages; youth and music everywhere.

A luscious red-head asks for an introduction to our "heart-breaker dept.", Leonard Bernstein.

"Why, of course."

The Bach-Mozart concerts have been very well done. Dr. K. being complimented on them. replied, "They're good composers!"

And while I was at the Administration Offices the other day, Koussevitsky came in dressed: in white flannel trousers; white and green striped sport coat; white beret; white woolen scarf; and white gloves. Quel bel attire!

Robert Shaw at the Boat House, running his chorus through Bach's "Christ Lag"; fishing tackle, sail boats, and Shaw in dungarees.

As you know, Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," is to provide THE sensation this summer. Fact is, Dr. Graf has left, and will not stage the opera; Eric Crozier (the original stager) is coming from England to take over. (By the way, Frances Yeend, to sing one of the principal roles, has silky blond tresses, down to her—down to the middle of her back. Saw them in the Ladies').

Last night's Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Concert (by the Krall Quartet) was adequate; I thought the quartet lacked integration. They were best on Haydn, bad on Beethoven, and interesting on the Prokofiev Quartet. The flippantly witty Prokofiev was unfortunately missing.

July 24, 1946.

Cher Maitre:

If this "Peter Gripes" business doesn't stop soon, I shall be forced to pay out $15, to read the full score. As it is, I've had to buy the libretto, so piqued have I been.

It is raining today.

I am overwhelmed by the tremendous amount of activity going on around here: Tanglewood; Jacob's Pillow—where I saw some arty dancing, and a real horror of a Wagner performance directed by Friedelind Wagner—; South Mountain Association, etc. And, of course, theatre "art" sprouts like mushrooms (the poisonous kind).

John Lessard, a Nadia Boulanger pupil, is one of the more interesting young composers around; it's rumoured that Bernstein may play his Violin Concerto at City Center.

At an Opera Workshop concert, heard that Krall girl, who has everything it takes for success; good-looking and a magnificent voice. By the way, she turned out to be the red-head who wanted to meet Bernstein!

Three youngsters — conducting proteges of Koussevitsky—did their stuff the next night, though I'd say they have mighty little of it. Whilst sunning myself on the raft at the Lake House, I had overheard one of these "future conductors" say: "I've finally found out how Bernstein does it." To be exact it was little X . . . Z . . . He conducted the dullest performance of the three.

I haven't said anything so far about Eleazar de Carvalho; shall write a separate story about him. He shouldn't be mentioned in the same breath with the other proteges. If it hadn't been for his extraordinarily forceful leadership, the "Emperor" Concerto that night would have gone completely astray; he got a real ovation.

Martinu, whose Piano Quintet was performed this morning, has had tough luck. A few days ago, right after luncheon, he stepped off a little terrace adjoining the dining-room, thereby breaking every rib in his poor body. But he is slowly recuperating from [illegible] concussion, and will be [illegible]

Last, but certainly not least, the wall-paper in the ladies' room at Tracy Hall (men's dorm) is decidedly Berkshire - Music - Center: lutes and fleur-de-lys, in alternating pattern!

BRITTEN, KOUSSEVITSKY: "Peter Grimes," parent and godparent.

BLITZSTEIN, BERNSTEIN: Berkshire visitor and his levitating host.

August 15, 1946.

Cher Maitre:

You must understand by this time that Tanglewood means Koussevitsky, Bernstein, and Britten (his "Peter Snipes"). But there are other great names about, too. Two young ones at the school whose names will interest you are the little Joachim boy (Brahms' friend, the violinist), and Mlle. Ysaye (another violinist's relative).

Getting it off my chest quickly, I will say this: that the Shostakovitch Ninth Symphony has come and gone. An eminently shallow work. People here were disappointed: seems they expected something much different, "greater," etc.

Britten has arrived, at last. But, before I forget, I want to mention another star student, a Curtis product called Nathan Goldstein. He played the Tchaikowsky Violin Concerto with such beautiful, beautiful [illegible] everyone gasped.

It occurred to me that I've said nothing yet (except for the Shostakovitch) about Koussevitsky's own concert series. Perhaps that's because I took their splendidness for granted. However, the Brahms programs were particularly fine, perhaps the most inspiring of all. I think bad programming was responsible for part of the let-down of the last concert; it ended, for some strange reason, with Tchaikowsky's "1812 Overture"! I don't think there's much point in mentioning other facts or impressions about this series, which must already have filtered their way down to you.

Now, I had nearly forgotten about "Peter Grimes" . . . can you imagine, when this whole place has gone nutty because of it. Here is the picture. Lenny didn't seem too happy about it at the very beginning. Neither did Britten or Crozier. Then came the first dress-rehearsal; everyone stayed up all night in the freezing shed. The intricacies of the music, of course, were enormous. Add to these the difficulties of a student production . . . Well, it was too bad of K. to have announced the opera as second to "Carmen." I think it's an ungrateful work; at times, forceful . . . I confess very little of it came through to me, and certainly there's no whole cloth about it—all this in spite of the good Berkshirites who were determined to be overwhelmed. I have been amused to see that no other accounts of the opera have dared to say this: that it lacks completeness, or musically-human feeling. But more of this when I return.

Amicalement,
Miriam de Kika.

Berkshire Eagle
July 27

Second Section

Koussevitzky and Players Invited to Electrics' Game

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra have invitations to the Pittsfield-Amsterdam game at Wahconah Park Monday night and, as far as President Paul A. Tamburello of the baseball club is concerned, the maestro doesn't have to bring his baton and the musicians can leave their instruments at Tanglewood. Formal attire is not required.

The ball club is just being the good neighbor, according to the invitation letter of Tamburello to Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra.

Tamburello's Letter

Tamburello's letter to Cabot follows:

I see by The Eagle that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in Berkshire for a three-week stand. It has also been pointed out to me that of the nine engagements for which your club is booked at Tanglewood, only on three occasions are there conflicts in dates with the public entertainment enterprise of which I have the honor to be president.

As a mark of appreciation, therefore, for the co-operation between the two clubs, I should like, on behalf of the Pittsfield Professional Baseball Corporation, through you, to invite Dr. Koussevitzky and the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be the guests of the club at Wahconah Park on Monday night, July 29, at 8. At this time the Pittsfield Electrics will play the Amsterdam Rugmakers in a regularly scheduled Canadian-American League baseball game.

While inferentially I am not making invidious comparisons between the talent represented in your field of endeavor, which I understand to be strictly major league, and that represented by the Pittsfield Electrics, which is only potentially so, I am rather sure that Maestro Rensa's boys would furnish Maestro Koussevitzky's men with an enjoyable evening of sport.

We should not, of course, expect the orchestra men to play

Noiseless Programs

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

The crackling of papers caused by fumbling with programs and digging for candies in paper bags disturbs the required silence during our Tanglewood concerts. The same annoyance can be experienced every day in any of our cinemas.

There is a simple remedy for this pestiferous performance. A great number of years ago (the writer is well beyond voting age) I attended the world-famous Salzburg concerts and the equally famous Wagnerian plays at Bayreuth. The elaborate multi-page programs handed out in these halls are what I would call "noiseless" programs. They are printed on a sort of blotting paper. No matter how you fumble, thumb or crush these programs, not a sound is heard. It is merely a question of selecting an unsized paper to print the program on.

In our Berkshire paper center this should cause no problem at all. Candy bags could be made of the same kind of paper. Not so easy would be the solution of noiseless peanut shells, a standard disturbance in movie houses.

ARTHUR PALME.

Pittsfield.

Aug 1

This Clipping From
HENDERSONVILLE, N. C.
TIMES NEWS

AUG 1 - 1946

On August 4, at Tanglewood, at the ~~Berkshire festival~~, one of the few surviving perfect violincelli made by Stradivari, the fabulous 250 - year - old "Lord Aylesford," will make its concert debut. It will be introduced by its new owner, Gregor Piatigorsky, who acquired it a few weeks ago at a price not disclosed but rumored to have been unusually high.

"The "Lord Aylesford" was made by Antonio Stradivari in Cremona in 1696. According to careful calculations, of all the instruments made by Stradivari, 540 violins, 12 violas and 50 'celli are actually known today.

Of the 'celli, fewer than 10 are in perfect condition. Of these, the "Lord Aylesford" is considered by experts to be one of the finest. The instrument was brought from Italy to London in 1780, where it was bought by Lord Aylesford. Later it passed into other private

L[illegible]ce the Music

By JOHN O'CONNOR

THE phenomenal growth of the recording business over the past decade is in itself something to wonder about, especially the grip it has taken on the general public. But more amazing is the manner in which it has hypnotized the music industry proper. A commercial tragedy—the Petrillo blackout—br[illegible] the disk business a billion dollars worth of publicity and favorable public relations and can be credited in some measure for the queer twist it has given the publishing field in so far as recording value is concerned. That it has a definite value goes without saying, not only from the standpoint of dollar profit without effort, but because of the flying start and continued exploitation an active record gives to a popular composition. Just a few years back a record was considered identical to a song's success and was valued more as a demonstration tool to encourage and procure live interpretations. Today the publishing field actually believes that a popular song hasn't a chance to survive unless it has at least one top label recording or a series of second string disks. And mighty few publishers feel safe in working on a song unless it has been measured for a wax impression. This despite the fact that mighty few songs have landed in the best seller division solely on the strength of one or a series of recordings. Records, especially since the arrival of the juke box and the entry of the disk jockey, were always rated a great help, but history proves that the necessary added push came from a series of musical and vocal presentations, via radio and personal appearances. Up to a few years ago the recording firms would not consider a composition until it had climbed up in public favor or they were definitely convinced that the publisher would give it an all-out campaign as a number one plug. Publishers selected their catalogues well in advance in those days, depended on their professional staffs and gave new songs a thorough tryout. If a number clicked it had to be recorded, but at least its life was ruled by the copyright owner. Production and picture songs were automatically recorded due to assured ballyhoo. Time has changed all that and today the publisher's program of activity is directed by a small group of men who select the nation's songs because they consider them good commercial recording property. A song may be classified as a great creation in lyric and melody, with cultural appeal and definite value for standardization, but if three or four men consider it of no recording value it goes down the chute.

ANALYZING this phenomenon one stumbles across a number of contributing causes, but the condition rests solely on a psychological basis. It subsists solely on a state of mind rather than an actual fact. So volumnious is the proof belying the theory, that it would require a small library of books to house the documentary and historical data listing the compositions which acquired the rating of standards without aid of disks, as against the few that were catapulted to the top by records unassisted. But if you confer with the gentry of the publishing field they will seriously tell you that without a record a new song hasn't a single chance and few of them will even invest in professional plates until a composition has been accepted by at least one disker. This all measures up to a complete surrender of selective judgment by the publishers and passes what amounts to total control of the music business to the powers in the mechanical field. The fact still remains that the song is the thing, record or no record; the music loving public continues as judge and jury notwithstanding, but we believe when it comes down to a matter of judgment in picking songs, the publisher, if only because of experience alone, is far better qualified to select the nation's musical product than a handful of mechanically minded experts. The music business is easing through one of the worst slumps of its career. During this period those posted twenty so-called "best sellers" were all waxed and given plenty of mechanical aid. Were those songs picked by publishers because they had absolute faith in their merit or were they forced out as current plug songs because of the marketed recordings? The real best sellers on that list included Berlin's score from "Annie Oakley," and a single pop song. And who will dispute the fact that all of them would have made the grade without the aid of platters? The profits realized from sheet sales always warranted the gamble of publication of a song whether recorded or not, but today's publishers of pop songs have obviously succumbed to the spell of the whirling disk. If the song is solid it will plough through anything and the recorders will have to recognize its value. But the prevalent fixed opinion that without a record a song is a dead duck is neither healthy nor good business. With a deep bow to the importance, value and popularity of the recording industry we prefer to see the music business directed by the copyright owners with the record continuing as it started, a friendly accessory, useful, profitable and helpful, but not all-powerful or recognized as the sole source of the music industry's life blood.

LAST spring we attended the National Music Educators Convention at Cleveland, primarily interested in the trade exhibits of the music business and its allied industries. We casually commented on the fact that while tradesmen helped in a large way to finance the entire party, the Conference program had the conferees hopping all over town attending clinics, lectures and meetings from dawn to bedtime with practically no time at all allowed for a satisfactory visit to the Auditorium basement where the trade exhibits were housed. The exhibitors went to considerable expense furnishing booths, hauling stock and other material in and out of Cleveland merely to be represented on the scene. We suggested in our report that a national music show, properly organized and supported by the entire industry, could easily develop into a profitable annual affair for all concerned. Practically every other industry of any importance in the nation stages one or more annual shows with economic safety and in most cases the industry as a whole is well rewarded in dividends and favorable public relations. An annual music business show, capably supervised and staged with the proper type of showmanship, [illegible] doubtless eclipse in importa[illegible] and grandeur any show or [illegible] exhibit heretofore [illegible] any of the [illegible] Such a present[illegible]ome internationally important since music in itself is a language of the universe. Trade organizations, representing all branches of the instrument industry, radio and record manufacturers; television, as well as all the other mechanical purveyors of sound, should be interested in such a venture. Staged at the proper season an international exhibition and show of this type would undoubtedly find ready support from everyone interested in music, as well as the general public. The cultural organizations, music clubs, teachers, and every individual from the creator of a composition to the purchaser of sheet music should find something to interest him in such a display. The American Government has emphasized the importance of American music in our foreign relations and such an exhibition would undoubtedly find a ready endorsement from not only the heads of our own Government but those of every foreign country. Properly directed, with the right type of musical entertainment to attract attendance, we fail to see how such a project could escape becoming an annual "must" for everyone directly or indirectly associated with the business of music.

THE music industry suffered a rapid series of hot and cold flashes since the first of the year and seems destined for a profitable journey through the fall and winter months, although it is just recovering from one of the worst slumps in its history. Eight months ago sales had attained an all-time high and the two million copy song was being casually predicted as a sure thing. And then the lights went out. The entire bottom seemed to fall away and sheet sales reached their lowest peak in months. Despite the beating the publishing firms steadfastly refused to cut overhead and labor figures show practically no drop whatever. The normal amount of staff changes ensued, but replacements took up the slack and despite the heavy losses shouldered, organization morale remained at top level. Small houses found it comparatively easy to weather the storm, but many of the larger firms, notwithstanding the reduced sale of standards also affected by the slump, accepted the sudden change in conditions cheerfully, confident of the inevitable turnabout when the market re[illegible] its customary pace. The[illegible]mism promises to be rew[illegible] for the re[illegible]om nat[illegible] jobbers in[illegible] music buye[illegible] are returning to the counte[illegible] and orders took a promising l[illegible] skyward a fortnight ago, [illegible]ily continuing on the upswing. A good song will always find a purchaser.

Berkshire Eagle
July 27

Second Section

Koussevitzky and Players Invited to Electrics' Game

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra have invitations to the Pittsfield-Amsterdam game at Wahconah Park Monday night and, as far as President Paul A. Tamburello of the baseball club is concerned, the maestro doesn't have to bring his baton and the musicians can leave their instruments at Tanglewood. Formal attire is not required.

The ball club is just being the good neighbor, according to the invitation letter of Tamburello to Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra.

Tamburello's Letter

Tamburello's letter to Cabot follows:

I see by The Eagle that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in Berkshire for a three-week stand. It has also been pointed out to me that of the nine engagements for which your club is booked at Tanglewood, only on three occasions are there conflicts in dates with the public entertainment enterprise of which I have the honor to be president.

As a mark of appreciation, therefore, for the co-operation between the two clubs, I should like, on behalf of the Pittsfield Professional Baseball Corporation, through you, to invite Dr. Koussevitzky and the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be the guests of the club at Wahconah Park on Monday night, July 29, at 8. At this time the Pittsfield Electrics will play the Amsterdam Rugmakers in a regularly scheduled Canadian-American League baseball game.

While inferentially I am not making invidious comparisons between the talent represented in your field of endeavor, which I understand to be strictly major league, and that represented by the Pittsfield Electrics, which is only potentially so, I am rather sure that Maestro Rensa's boys would furnish Maestro Koussevitzky's men with an enjoyable evening of sport.

We should not, of course, expect the orchestra men to play

Noiseless Programs

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

The crackling of papers caused by fumbling with programs and digging for candies in paper bags disturbs the required silence during our Tanglewood concerts. The same annoyance can be experienced every day in any of our cinemas.

There is a simple remedy for this pestiferous performance. A great number of years ago (the writer is well beyond voting age) I attended the world-famous Salzburg concerts and the equally famous Wagnerian plays at Bayreuth. The elaborate multi-page programs handed out in these halls are what I would call "noiseless" programs. They are printed on a sort of blotting paper. No matter how you fumble, thumb or crush these programs, not a sound is heard. It is merely a question of selecting an unsized paper to print the program on.

In our Berkshire paper center this should cause no problem at all. Candy bags could be made of the same kind of paper. Not so easy would be the solution of noiseless peanut shells, a standard disturbance in movie houses.

ARTHUR PALME.

Pittsfield.

Aug 1

[215]

This Clipping From
HENDERSONVILLE, N. C.
TIMES NEWS

AUG 1 - 1946

On August 4, at Tanglewood, at the ~~Berkshire festival~~, one of the few surviving perfect violincelli made by Stradivari, the fabulous 250-year-old "Lord Aylesford," will make its concert debut. It will be introduced by its new owner, Gregor Piatigorsky, who acquired it a few weeks ago at a price not disclosed but rumored to have been unusually high.

"The "Lord Aylesford" was made by Antonio Stradivari in Cremona in 1696. According to careful calculations, of all the instruments made by Stradivari, 540 violins, 12 violas and 50 'celli are actually known today.

Of the 'celli, fewer than 10 are in perfect condition. Of these, the "Lord Aylesford" is considered by experts to be one of the finest. The instrument was brought from Italy to London in 1780, where it was bought by Lord Aylesford. Later it passed into other private

30,000 At Boston Symphony Opening Concerts at Lenox

By Staff Correspondent

LENOX, July 29.—The past weekend, the Tanglewood Shed with its six thousand capacity and the huge surrounding grounds have been thronged with thirty thousand spectators to hear the three opening concerts of the ninth Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

For the first time in five years, the opening concerts have been favored with perfect weather. The only soloist of the opening series (Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon) was Eugene List, young American pianist. The Ex-Army Sergeant of Pottsdam fame received an ovation for his playing of Rachmaninoff's "Concerto No. 2, in C minor" at the Saturday concert.

Each of the three events attracted an unusually large number of celebrities. Among them were Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, Lady Berenson of New Zealand, and H. V. Kaltenborn.

Royalty was represented by Prince and Princess Ladislas Sapieha, and her mother Baroness Louise Bornemixza, Princess Toussoun of Egypt, Baroness Humbert de Viry of Shipton Court, Countess Max de Foras, and Princess Diane R. Eristavi.

Notable Reservations

Included among the reservations which have sold out the entire series of nine concerts are those of Jimmy Cagney, Walter Winchell, Vincent Sheean, Joseph P. Kennedy, Clare Luce, Mrs. Myron Taylor and a host of top-flight musicians.

Last Thursday night's program included the first American performance of Shostakovich's "Ninth Symphony." Compared to the seventh and eight symphonies by the same composer it is gay, almost frolicsome. It was not received with the enthusiasm that the seventh symphony received here in 1941, but it was nevertheless given a warm reception.

Another first American performance will be that of the opera, "Peter Grimes" by the English composer Benjamin Britten on August 6. Britten and Eric Crozier, who directed the world premier in London, are on their way from England to supervise the production.

Frances Yeend, who sang in the "Messiah" in Worcester two seasons ago, Joseph Laderoute, who has been heard in Worcester with the Connecticut Opera Company, and James Pease, who is to sing at the forthcoming Worcester Festival, all have leading roles in "Peter Grimes."

More than four hundred students have enrolled in the Berkshire Music Center to study with its world-famed faculty. About eighty are from Massachusetts and Worcester is represented by Wayne Barrington, son of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Barrington of 31 Perkins street. The enrollment is from coast-to-coast. with Canada and South America well represented.

Brahm's Festival

Next week-end (Aug. 1, 3, 4) is to be a Brahms festival with the following soloists: Claudio Arrau, pianist; Carol Brice, contralto; Erica Morini, violinist; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist.

The final series (Aug. 8, 10, 11) will consist of miscellaneous works, Piatigorsky again as soloist, and Mischa Elman playing the Martinu violin concerto.

Some idea of the importance of the Berkshire Festival opening last Thursday night was indicated by the presence of thirty-two music critics from all over the United States. Among improvements made at Tanglewood this year is a new press room near the entrance which is amply supplied with typewriters and direct wires to the various newspapers.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE JULY 29

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUL 29 1946

---

p. 18

, MONDAY, JULY 29, 1946

—Hague—

Berkshire Festival Throng Cheers Director Koussevitzky

LENOX, Mass. — The first of three weekends of Berkshire Festival Concerts by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony closed Sunday afternoon with a stirring performance of the great Fifth Symphony of Tchaikowsky, bringing fervent cheers and applause from the nearly 10,000 hearers who filled the huge music shed and stretched out on the lawn in all directions.

This great crowd—made up of people from all walks of life, many of whom came by car, bus and train from distant points, overtaxing all the eating and sleeping accommodations of this and neighboring communities—points up by its size, democratic character, devoted interest and enthusiasm the contention voiced by Dr. Koussevitzky in his address last month at the opening of the Berkshire Music Center that, "more than any other art, music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers, and speaks a language accessible to all." It would also seem to lend weight to his plea for government subsidy of the arts—especially musical art—a project that might make possible festivals as fine as the Berkshire in many parts of the country, readily accessible to all the people, without reliance on the private funds and the efforts of public-spirited individuals through which this musical miracle comes to pass here in Berkshire County once a year.

* * *

An even greater crowd had attended Saturday evening's concert, when Dr. Koussevitzky directed Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, the Second Piano Concerto of Rachmaninoff with young Eugene List as soloist, and the Second Suite from Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe.

Since all this music is thrice-familiar to concert-goers, interest focused chiefly on performance, and, in two instances at least, what performances they were! Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston players presented the Beethoven Pastoral with all the care, devotion and skill that this happy masterpiece deserves. And what could be more suitable for a cool Summer evening beneath Tanglewood's stately trees than this peaceful, temperate and sweet-humored music, with its exciting but intensely musical thunderstorm and beautiful song of rural rejoicing. In the Ravel, conductor and orchestra achieved the most dazzling realization of this magical score that this listener has ever been privileged to hear. It was all animation, glowing colors, pulsating rhythms and wonderful sounds. It was passionate and alive—not merely slick and shimmering as some conductors play it—from the irrepressibly exuberant yet delicately turned solo flute passages to the overpoweringly sensuous sonorities drawn from the full orchestra. It was a superb demonstration of the modern orchestra at its most telling and virtuosic best.

There were good things, too, about the Rachmaninoff—that 20th Century pianistic warhorse which recently has contributed Full Moon and Empty Arms to the jukebox in the corner saloon—and Mr. List's performance in it brought a lion's share of the evening's applause. A notably proficient pianist, with accurate, agile fingers and a nice, well controlled tone, he was most convincing in the second movement, where he was most in rapport with the orchestra. Elsewhere he lacked some of the bravura brilliance and emotional flair needed to make the piano part stand up against the ensemble. In the juicier passages, his measured, sober pianism was no match for the throbbing Russian variety of schmaltz Dr. Koussevitzky was drawing from the other instrumentalists.

Sunday's concert opened with Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony—Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra setting forth the lovely serenade-like Second Movement with especial grace and the final saltarello with exceptional precision and verve—and continued with Aaron Copland's suite from the ballet, Appalachian Spring, composed for and introduced by Martha Graham two seasons ago. This ingratiating, imaginative and sincerely affecting American score, performed with uncommon warmth, understanding and adroitness, was enthusiastically received by the audience with Dr. Koussevitzky summoning its composer to the stage to bow with himself and the orchestra. As for the Tchaikowsky Fifth, those who have heard Dr. Koussevitzky conduct this Slavic masterpiece on many other occasions do not need to be told that it is a work on which he lavishes all his heart and soul and technical skill with enkindling results. The present revealing and deeply moving performance was no exception.

* * *

Saturday afternoon, in Tanglewood's theater-concert hall, students of the Berkshire Music Center took part in a concert of choral music under the direction of Robert Shaw. The program was pleasant and well presented; the technical and interpretive quality of the singing showed what remarkably good results Mr. Shaw can achieve with vocal groups in a short space of time, the Center having been open only since the first of this month. Particularly fine was the rendition of Poulenc's five charming children's choruses, Petites Voix, by an ensemble of girls' voices. There was much that was enjoyable, too, in the presentation of Norman Dello Joio's The Mystic Trumpeter, to a text from Walt Whitman, by a mixed chorus with Patricia Neway handling the soprano solo part engagingly, and Brahms' Liebeslieder Walzer (text by Daumer), sung by men's and women's voices with William Jonson and Julius Katchen providing the able two-piano accompaniment.

The concert, one of the many student orchestral, choral and operatic performances offered during the Summer session, was a convincing demonstration of the fine work being done here at the Berkshire Music Center. Founded in 1940 by Dr. Koussevitzky as a place for "living and working in music"—a realization of a special dream of his dating back to his European days—the Center, after being closed for three wartime Summers, is now actively functioning again with an enrollment of 400 students.

Incidentally, as a result of auditions held last week, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen four singers now studying at the center to be soloists in the Festival performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on Aug. 11. The quartet, made up of Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor, and James Pease, bass, serves as a good example of the diverse geographical sources from which the center's student body comes. Miss Yeend is from the State of Washington, Miss Alberts from Brookline, Mass., Laderoute from Canada and Pease from Indiana.

—ROBERT A. HAGUE.

9500 Attend Sunday Berkshire Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, July 28.—The last concert in the first series of the Berkshire Festival was played this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. There was an audience of 9500 which filled the shed to its 6000 capacity and extended far out on the surrounding grounds.

Tanglewood was at its scenic best and for the third time this week the occasion was favored with perfect weather.

These are but two of the many reasons why some 30,000 spectators have come to Tanglewood during the past week to hear this wonderful music. This figure, by the way, does not include the thousands who have also attended the public rehearsals, as well as the lectures and the students' activities.

Three Symphonic Works

This afternoon's program included three symphonic works—Mendelssohn's "Symphony in A Major, No. 4, Opus 90" (Italian), Aaron Copland's suite from the ballet "Appalachian Spring" and Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, Opus 64."

The pre-intermission portion consisted of the first two works named—as varied a diet as you can imagine. The cool airiness of the Mendelssohn music was delightfully amiable preparation for Coplan's and Tschaikowsky's emotional and tonal involvements

Koussevitsky's concern for detailed treatment in a score as disarming as the "Italian Symphony" continues to be reason for admiration. Quite apart from accepted requirements, he derives the maximum effect from every phrase.

Again we speak with special regard of the string section to which Mendelssohn assigned so much of his singing melody. It should be added that the tonal blemishes committed by the brass section at the two preceding evening concerts were more than compensated for particularly in the opening movement of the Mendelssohn symphony.

COPLAND BALLET

The suite from the ballet "Appalachian Spring" is another typical Aaron Copland score. Incidentally it not only won the Pulitzer prize but also the award of the music critics' circle of New York.

Briefly the story concerns the fears wrought in a newly-married couple by neighbors and a passing revivalist and his followers. The scene is a newly-built farmhouse in the hills of Pennsylvania during the early part of the last century.

With this sketchy theme to guide you and the fact that the music itself inspired Martha Graham choreography, it assumes a full measure of coherence only temporarily toward the end of the work when the composer "borrows" a simple Shaker theme. Throughout it indulges freely in the technics of the modern "isms" in conveying the tale. Since its melodic pursuits wander even more widely than in the new Shostakovich "Ninth Symphony," there is a strong inclination on the part of the more staunch conservatives to regard this score as excellent background for some Grade B movie.

The orchestra and conductor were, as usual, in their element with Tschaikowsky's sweeping declarations in his "Fifth Symphony." Virtually every note is wrung of its full power by Kousevitzky, and Tschaikowsky's music having the universal meaning that it has, the audience did its best to express hearty endorsement.

This series will be resumed next Thursday evening, with concerts on the following Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon.

Editorials

Science, Invention and The Music Festival

The reported invention of a noiseless paper bag will be welcomed by movie and theatre-goers and others who are subject to the annoyance of losing the best lines in the crackle of paper or cellophane when a near-by seat-holder reaches for a sweet. If the inventor will proceed from his present triumph to devising noiseless peanuts, crunchless popcorn, or possibly an adaptation of the Maxim silencer designed to fit any mouth, he will rate a statue in front of the Capitol at Washington and an oversized niche in the Hall of Fame.

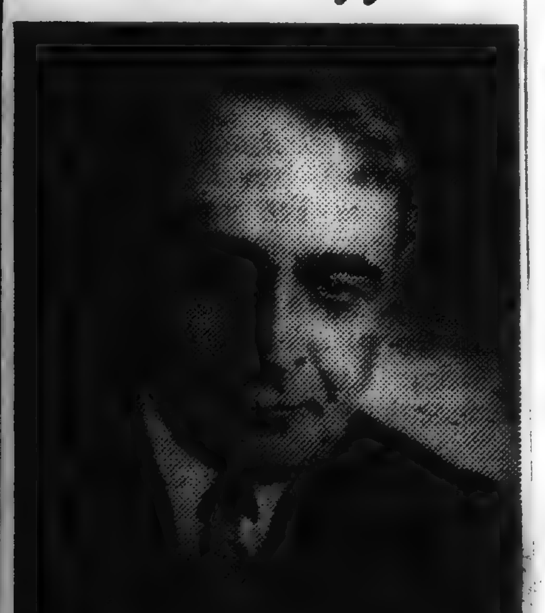
Even these devices would not eliminate all the distractions that beset those who go to an aural entertainment for the sole purpose of listening to it. It might be thought that the Shed at Tanglewood would contain only those who knew and loved music and desired to hear it. The fact that there has been applause at inappropriate points in the programs of the first few days is proof that not all of the audience belong to the cognoscenti. The buzz of conversation audible in pauses, which has several times delayed the beginning of the next movement, seems to indicate that some of those present consider Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony to have the same function as the orchestra in a restaurant—to provide musical background for the verbal exchange of ideas. As nuisances, these gentry vie with those whose alarm clocks are out of order and whose late arrival entails a five-minute interruption in the first offering on the program.

The Tanglewood Festival is not, like the opera of old, principally or even secondarily a social event. It was instituted and is continued for people interested in listening to the best music. The interests of music-lovers is paramount, and those whose attention is elsewhere or who do not care for a particular selection should either stay away or have the grace to keep quiet.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

JUL 29 1946

Hats Off!



PM takes off its hat today to Serge Koussevitzky for his distinguished contribution to America's world of music through a long career—and especially for his founding of the Berkshire Music Center and the hard work he has put into his dream of a "place for living and working in music." (See story by Robert Hague on Page 18.)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 29 1946

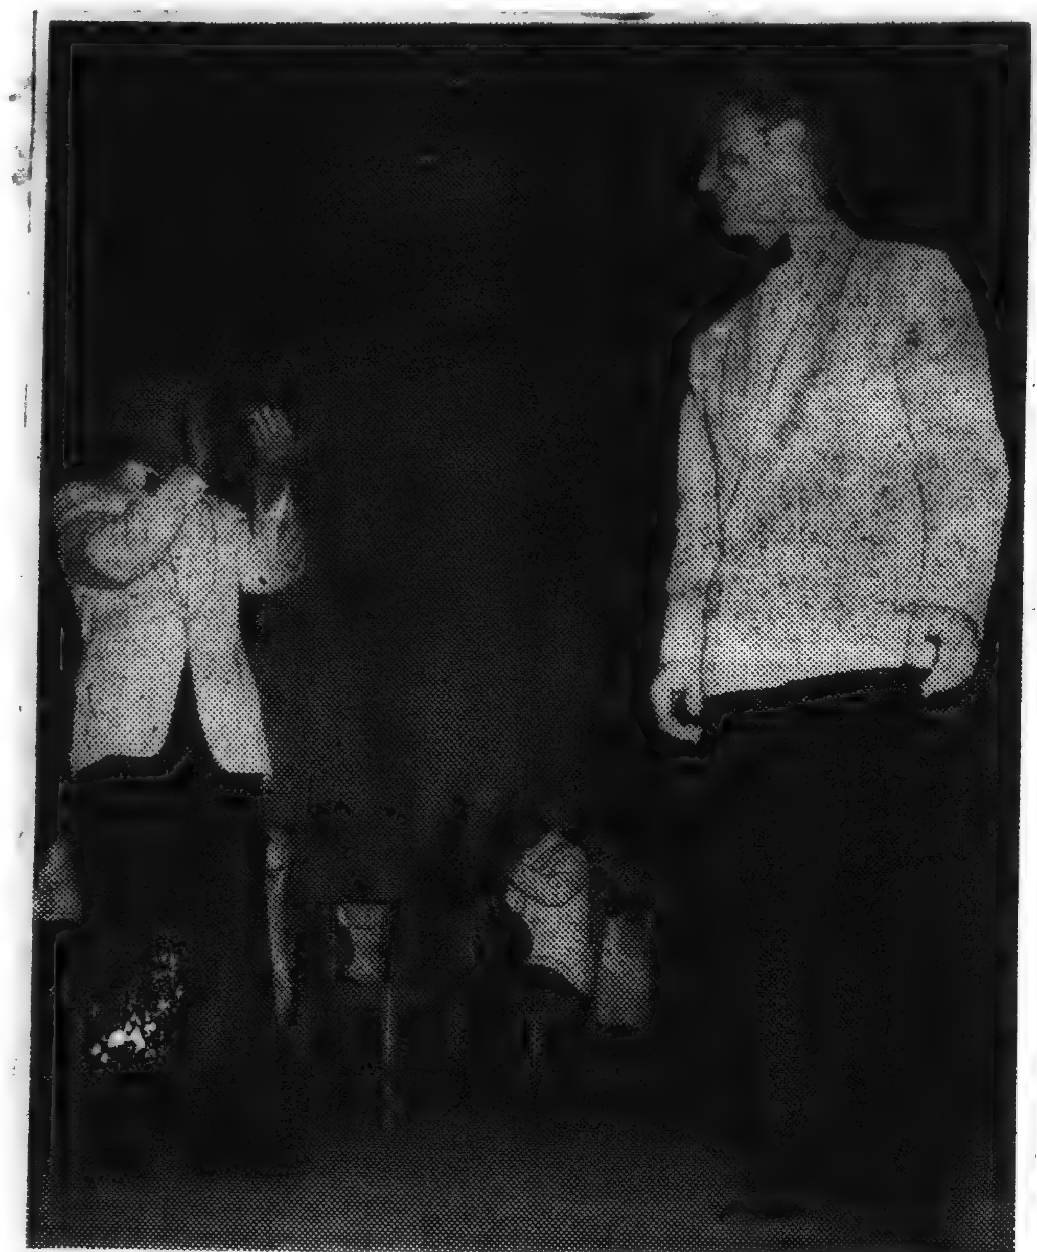
Eager Crowd of 10,000 Reported at Tanglewood

Lenox, July 28—A wildly enthusiastic audience of 10,000 this afternoon heard the third and final concert of the first series in the current Boston Symphony orchestra festival at Tanglewood.

The weather was perfect and Ward F. Gaston, superintendent of Tanglewood estate, estimated that 1500 had their Sunny dinner, picnic style on the grounds. Fully 2000 soda pop bottles were scattered on the lawn near the music shed.

State and local police cooperated in handling traffic and arrangements were the best for any of the concerts so far given. The second series will start Thursday night.

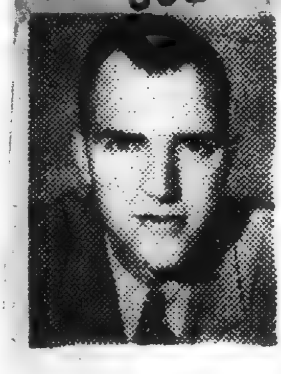
[216]



PIANIST TAKES A BOW: Eugene List, who appeared as soloist at the Berkshire Festival Saturday night, accepts the plaudits of the audience and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

JUL 29 1946



Words and Music

Tanglewood Like Saratoga Without Horses, Jockeys

By John Briggs

Lenox, Mass., July 29—Tanglewood, home of the Berkshire Music Festival, bulged at the seams this week-end, with thousands of music-lovers who couldn't get away for Thursday's concert arriving for the Saturday and Sunday performances by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky's soloist on Saturday evening was the young American pianist Eugene List, playing Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 2 in C Minor. The performance was so-so. Mr. List's playing was, as always, spontaneous and expressive; but it lacked precision at many important points in the music; and Mr. Koussevitzky's handling of the accompaniment was not always above reproach. The Koussevitzky tempi were inclined throughout to be a little too impetuous. The broad, majestic theme of the final movement, familiar to all WQXR listeners, was rushed until its impressiveness was lost.

Luminous Tone

Then Mr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra brilliantly demonstrated what they could do with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony and the "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2 of Ravel. For beautifull clarity and precision in orchestral playing I think it is difficult to match the Bostonians. Their tone has an almost luminous quality. Every part stands out clearly. Unlike some conductors, who seize on the principal melody and subdue everything else, Mr. Koussevitzky seemingly reasons that if Beethoven scored for oboe or bassoon it was because he wanted the woodwinds to be heard. They are heard, when Koussevitzky plays. No part is obscured: and the overall impression is one of perfect tonal balance. As an orchestral technician the Boston conductor is unique.

The Sunday program, which opened with Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and Aaron Copland's ballet suite, "Appalachian Spring," had as its climax a Koussevitzky specialty—Tchaikovsky in E Minor. As usual, Tchaikovsky as played by Koussevitzky brought the week-end's music to a stirring conclusion.

Horseless Carnival

The audience loved it, as they did everything about the festival. This place is a carnival as well as a concert series. It is Saratoga without the horses. Instead of gawking at famous jockeys and millionaire sportsmen, visitors mob Piatigorsky as he strolls across the Tanglewood lawn with his cello under his arm, and relate excitedly how they sat next to Aaron Copland or Leonard Bernstein at last night's concert.

There is music in the air. The town is full of musical performers, composers and conductors. The shops display miniature orchestra scores along with postcards and antique candle-snuffers. Everybody whistles the music from last night's concert.

Businessmen with the unmistakable look of Scarsdale or Back-Bay gravely discuss Beethoven as they sip cokes in the refreshment tent.

Altogether it is a lot of fun. And that is as good a reason for listening to music as any that I can think of.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 29 1946

THIRD CONCERT GIVEN IN BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 28—The program of the third concert of the ninth Berkshire Festival, given this afternoon by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, consisted of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, the suite from Aaron Copland's ballet, "Appalachian Spring," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony.

The attendance was the second largest thus far of the festival, numbering 9,500 persons, and bringing the total audience for the first week, with the 8,000 of the opening night and 10,000 of yesterday, to 27,500.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 29 1946

PROGRAM CLINGS TO CONSERVATIVE AT TANGLEWOOD

Aaron Copland's Ballet Suite Is Exception—'Italian' and Tschaikowsky Work Thrill Audience at Shed

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, July 28 — With the exception of Aaron Copland's ballet suite, "Appalachian Spring," the second number on the Boston Symphony orchestra's program at Tanglewood this afternoon, there was a return to the more conservative element, Dr Serge Koussevitzky choosing two [illegible] the "Italian" by Mendelssohn, and the "Symphony No. 5 in E Minor" by Tschaikowsky.

Written as a commission from Mrs Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge for a ballet to be danced by Martha Graham, Copland's opus, although more effective as a ballet, is another work in this form sufficiently solid of structure and substance to stand the test as a concert piece. It is thematically rich, admirable in its contrast of striking stark rhythm, and well orchestrated. After the slow introduction, there is a sudden burst of unison in the strings, probably intended to be Appalachian in its folksy appeal, but nevertheless very reminiscent of Peter's theme in Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf." This does not alter the fact that the development of this section represents one of the best pieces of instrumentation we have heard from the pen of Copland. As in the "Lincoln Portrait" and other of his works, the composer resorts to tunes of the period with success, in the present work utilizing a Shaker melody "The Gift to Be Simple," introduced first by a solos clarinet and developed into five ingenious variations. Although the piece ends on a quiet hushed note intoned on muted strings, the audience broke the calm with rousing applause at its conclusion.

Mendelssohn's symphony, seemingly "Italian" for no other reason than the rhythm of its Italian folk-dance in the last movement, remembered for its fine performance by the Springfield orchestra under Alexander Leslie during the last season, was direct in its appeal not only through the simplicity of its melodic content but its vivid and very vitalized performance. This was true as well of the Tschaikowsky "Fifth." It is good to hear familiar compositions of this kind which are well grounded in the musical consciousness not only of the musician but the musical layman as well. This afternoon the tremendous audience was enraptured in the performance and followed the conductor's every gesture to the point that they, too, seemed part of the performance. It was a truly thrilling interpretation.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

JUL 29 1946

RICHNESS AND SPIRIT MARK REVIVAL OF BERKSHIRE CONCERTS

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS
BUFFALO EVENING NEWS Music Editor

PITTSFIELD, Mass., July 29.—The music shed at Tanglewood in the Berkshire Hills between Lenox and Stockbridge echoed and re-echoed during the past week-end with the bravos and applause of overflowing audiences at the first three concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival. The concerts opened the ninth Berkshire Festival and the first to be held since its wartime suspension in 1943.

The tremendous ovations for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra which plays the festival concerts, came just as the noted leader celebrated his 72d birthday. There was a personal and affectionate note in the enthusiasm of the audiences as they applauded the man who has made his vision of an annual American symphonic festival come true.

Dr. Koussevitzky's influence on the lifestream of music in this country cannot be overestimated. The magnificent orchestra he has developed, the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center, where talented music students can have the experience of "collective" music-making under the guidance of fine musical authorities, are all contributing a rich and invaluable animus to American musical life.

* * *

On the basis of sound alone, the Boston Symphony stands alone. For sheer beauty of tone, superb blending and balance of dynamics it is one of the musical wonders of today. The opening concerts of the festival were played with great richness and spirit.

Of special and transcendant beauty were Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," Ravel's Second Suite, "Daphnis and Chloe," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. In each case, the bardic glory of the readings seemed as if Dr. Koussevitzky were inspired with a rare fire and the orchestra along with him. Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony was a particular marvel of loveliness in the Sunday afternoon blue and green of the Berkshire Hills and sky.

* * *

Two Beethoven symphonies — the "Gzeroica" and the "Pastoral" — also shone tonally, though the over-refinement of Dr. Koussevitzky's expressive treatment frequently broke the flow of the musical line. Aaron Copland's appealing suite, "Appalachian Spring," was most cordially received, the composer joining the conductor in acknowledging the applause.

The novelty of the opening week-end and eagerly-awaited by admirers of Dimitri Shostakovich was the Russian composer's Ninth Symphony. Played at the first concert, this turned out to be a happy-go-lucky, frequently-banal work, as easy to take as a marshmallow and about as satisfying. It exploits Shostakovich's flair for sharp contrasts in instrumentation, has jolly little melodic bits that sound disturbingly familiar and tends toward a certain monotony of rhythmic pattern.

* * *

Talented young Eugene List, pianist, was the only soloist of the week-end concerts. Mr. List, heard in that work written for giants of the keyboard, the Rachmaninoff Second Piano Concerto, gave it a gallant and likable reading.

Between 8000 and 9000 persons from every state in the Union and from Canada attended the concerts, festival officials announced.

The second week-end of concerts, starting Thursday evening, will be devoted to works by Brahms, and the third, beginning the evening of Aug. 8, will be climaxed by a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Caroline Brown of 102 Oakgrove Drive, Williamsville, is a member of the student body at the Berkshire Music Center.

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL

JUL 29 1946

—THE CONCERT—

Syracusans At Opening of Festival

Herald-Journal Wire

LENOX, Mass. — Thousands of music lovers, including the great and near great in artistic circles, students, teachers, and patrons of the arts thronged Tanglewood, Lenox, over the week-end for opening of the Berkshire Festival.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director, was given an ovation. There were tremendous interest, also, in all sections of the orchestra. Saturday night's concert, with Eugene List as soloist, was of particular appeal to those who have watched the young American pianist's career here and abroad. In Germany he played for President Truman, while overseas to entertain U. S. troops. List played the Rachmaninoff Concerto No. 2 in C Minor, Opus 18, with facile touch and in a light and charming mood which may be likened to an obligato to the impressive symphonic interpretation under the Koussevitzky baton.

THE BETHOVEN No. 6 — Pastoral Symphony — was notable in its message particularly in the storm passages—the bass section using the entire hand over the strings. Brasses also were well handled. Also included in the well balanced program was the Ravel Daphnis et Chloe ballet with fine opportunity for harps.

Sunday afternoon's program brought another record audience to the shed. The Mendelssohn Symphony in a Major No. 4, Italian Opus 90 was given meticulous reading in all four movements, the second, the Andante being beautifully interpreted.

Aaron Copeland, American composer, was represented by the suite from the ballet "Appalachian Spring," the eight sections played without interruption. Following prolonged applause, Dr. Koussevitzky brought Mr. Copeland to the podium to receive further tribute from the large audience.

Then came superb playing of the Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony with its lovely melody, its sweep and intense dramatic movements. The strings, glowing and vibrant, the trumpets and brasses eloquent; the music is Koussevitzky's.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY returned again and again to the stage to acknowledge the prolonged applause, the tribute being shared with his musicians. Outside the great shed there were murmuring pines and hemlocks in a perfect midsummer day's setting against hills now in sunshine, now in shadow.

Though miles from the ocean, the sound, over all, in the music shed during intermission, with thousands talking, was not unlike the sound of the sea in a benign mood.

AMONG THOSE in attendance were Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Cook of Fayetteville, the Rev. Dr. Lynn J. Radcliffe of Chicago, former minister of First Methodist Church, Syracuse; Mrs. Harry L. Vibbard, organist of May Memorial Unitarian Church, here for the full season; Mrs. Conrad L. Becker, who divides her time between Tanglewood and Bristol, Conn., Mrs. A. Dean Dudley, Mrs. Ada Shinaman Crouse, organist and music director of First Presbyterian Church and Fine Arts College faculty member; Mrs. Edward M. Jones, soprano of Betts Memorial Universalist choir. With Mrs. Dudley, who is on her way to Boothbay Harbor, Me., are her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Post, Jr., of Wellesley Hills, Mass., and Miss Jane Grey Dudley of New York City, another daughter. Mrs. Post recently was named head of Wellesley College Alumnae Council.

En route the Syracuse group had a luncheon party in the Dewitt Clinton Hotel, Albany, where Ernest Charles, widely known composer, joined them. Mr. Charles, native of Minneapolis, Minn, now in New York wrote such appealing songs as "When I Have Sung My Songs," "My Lady Walks in Loveliness," "Clouds" and several sacred numbers, more than 50 in all.—E. V. W.

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From
GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
LEADER-REPUBLICAN
JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From
CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.
PROGRESS
JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From
DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
JOURNAL
JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From
ST. CLOUD, MINN.
TIMES
JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From PARIS, TEXAS
NEWS
JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From
HIBBING, MINN.
TRIBUNE
JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From ELYRIA, OHIO
CHRONICLE TELEGRAM

This Clipping From PORTSMOUTH, VA.
STAR

This Clipping From STERLING, COLO.
ADVOCATE
JUL 29 1946

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

Mis Ann Davenport, a June graduate of the Shipley school will be at the Berkshire Music Center this summer. The school opens tomorrow under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. Miss Davenport [illegible] Holyoke in the fall. She is the daughter of Atty. and Mrs. Russell L. Davenport.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-[illegible]
JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From WELLSVILLE, N. Y.
REPORTER
JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From PADUCAH, KY.
SUN-DEMOCRAT
JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
JUL 29 1946

BIDDEFORD, ME.
JOURNAL
JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From LAFAYETTE, LA.
DAILY ADVERTISER
JUL 29 1946

This Clipping From LYNCHBURG, VA.
ADVANCE
JUL 29 1946

GOING OVER SCORE—Tenor William Horne, (left) selected by Serge Koussevitsky (center) to sing the title role in the American premiere of the English opera, "Peter Grimes," at the Berkshire festival, Tanglewood, Mass., goes over the score with Dr. Koussevitsky and Leonard Bernstein, conductor of the premiere performance.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

THOUSANDS HEAR CONCERT SERIES

Superb Performances Given at Tanglewood

By Willard M. Clark

LENOX, July 28—"Perfect Tanglewood weather." That was the phrase heard time after time during the past week when on Thursday and Saturday nights and this afternoon, the first of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra were given at Tanglewood. Thousands of persons from all parts of the country gathered on the spacious grounds of the Berkshire Music Center to hear three programs of great music, superlatively performed under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Best on Saturday

Of the three programs, that given Saturday night was the most rewarding. Never have we heard a more communicative performance of Beethoven's sixth or "Pastoral" symphony. It was a performance so restrained as to dynamics, tonally satisfying and clear as to outline that it will linger long in the memory. Rachmaninoff's "Concerto No. 2" for piano and orchestra was written some 40 years ago. Today its melodies remain so lovely, so engaging are its rhythms, that a Cole Porter, a Romberg, or a Gershwin might have written them. However, it takes a skilled pianist and really great orchestra to realize the full effect of this work and Eugene List, young American pianist and the Boston players formed an unbeatable combination to give complete expression to the music. List is a splendid lyric artist, musical, sensitive, imaginative, and, of course, technically sure. While he had all the bravura necessary and, at most times, the necessary strength to cope with the fortissimi built up by the orchestra, he was at his very best in the lyrical measures of the adagio movement. It was a performance that brought shouts of joy from the huge audience. The final number was the second suite of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," a work which the Bostonians have made particularly their own. Shimmering beauty, play of color, vitality and rhythmic sensitivity made this performance a veritable tour de force.

Over 10,000 Attend

The concert today brought out an audience of more than 10,000 persons. Thousands were outside the shed. During these three concerts we have been taken on several musical journeys. We have traveled through a museum to see "Pictures at an Exhibition." We have been through the meadowlands of the "Pastoral" symphony and this afternoon we listened to Mendelssohn's "Symphony in A Major, No. 4," known as the "Italian" symphony. Listening to it, one could only marvel at the revitalizing influence of the Koussevitzky tempi and the clarity with which each theme was enunciated.

The novelty on today's program was the orchestral suite from the ballet, "Appalachian Spring," written for the dancer Martha Graham, by Aaron Copland and first performed by her in the Library of Congress at the Coolidge Festival in 1944. Oft times the purely orchestral music for the dance loses much without the accompanying action, but this suite is so completely an entity that it carries on alone most satisfactorily. The story centers round a newly married couple at a "pioneer celebration in the spring" around a newly-built farmhouse. The music is earthy, makes liberal use of folk tunes and rhythms, particularly five variations on an old Shaker tune, and even in its most lyrical moments, never loses vitality. Its eight episodes are played without pause. It is provocative music which needs more than one hearing to grasp it entirely, but first hearing shows that Mr. Copland has written sturdy music of real American flavor. The composer was on hand to share the applause with Dr. Koussevitzky and the players. For sheer virtuosity, the pianissimi passages of the final episode were unparalleled.

The concert closed with a cheer-provoking performance of Tschaikowsky's "Fifth Symphony in E Minor." Dr. Koussevitzky's readings of the Tschaikowsky symphonies are too well known to need extended comment. This afternoon climax was piled on climax, creating a tension which broke into tumultuous applause and shouts as the final note was played. It was a performance of the sort which the thousands had come to hear; without which a Tanglewood Festival would not be complete.

The second series of three concerts next Thursday and Saturday night and Sunday afternoon will be devoted to the [illegible] of Johannes Brahams. While this will be far sturdier music than has gone before, we were told that every seat has been taken and only entrance tickets are available for the three concerts.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

Tanglewood Concert Attracts Thousands

Boston Symphony Plays Third Program in Berkshire Festival Dr. Koussevitzky Conducting

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ensemble, the eminent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and those fortunate enough to attend, had one of the most perfect days of the summer for the third program of the Berkshire Festival Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood, Lenox. It was a happy occasion for those inside the shed and the hundreds outside on the spacious lawns, many of them coming early to stroll about the grounds and enjoy snacks at intervals.

Mendelssohn, Copland and Tchaikovsky, a fine selection in contrasting musical forms and moods were picked, the concert starting at 3:30 on the dot, and ending at 5:30 with a short intermission before the orchestra began the beautiful Andante of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, Opus 64. This was the major work of the afternoon though Mendelssohn's A Major Symphony (Italian), and Aaron Copland's Suite from the Ballet, "Appalachian Spring," were too important and too neatly done to start in on a good, better, best.

Spring Fete

"Appalachian Spring," heard by the majority for the first time merited for the composer who was in the audience yesterday afternoon the Pulitzer award for musical composition in 1945. Dr. Koussevitzky gave earnest consideration to the descriptive piece which was written by Mr. Copland for Miss Martha Graham. Previously the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the piece in October, 1945. At the conclusion of the arresting number Mr. Copland shared applause with Dr. Koussevitzky who joined in the applause for Mr. Copland. The composition describes a typical American rustic background in the Pennsylvania hills, a Spring fete, as the program notes stated, "a pioneer celebration in the spring around a newly-built farmhouse in the Pennsylvania hills in the early part of the last century." The ballet music is inspired by Martha Graham and the orchestral arrangement introduces the characters in the dance, first slowly, then fast, and quite fast, still faster, returning to the mood of the opening, then calm and flowing, and lastly moderate, all what is known as "modern" as was sketchily explained by the person in the row behind to her neighbor who was willing to learn all about "Appalachian Spring" but was waiting for Tchaikovsky's Fifth, the conclusion of which brought the audience to their feet raising hands high in the air, and waving handkerchiefs; many hurrying out to catch busses and clapping and waving as they exited.

All the beauty of the Mendelssohn music was brought out in the four movements and the perfection in execution in all sections is not easy to describe nor the purity of tone in the exquisite passages of all four parts.

Tchaikovsky's Fifth

The many beautiful and familiar themes with which the Tchaikovsky Symphony abounds held the audience enthralled, three distinct melodies, in the Andante cantabile, haunting, and as the notes explain, the return of the second melody rather than the appealing first closes that lovely part of the symphony. Then followed the Valse and the magnificent finale, which was something better understood, perhaps, by our neighbor in back who let out a profound gasp or sigh or both at the close. The Fifth Symphony cannot fail with an orchestra of superior musicians and the vast throng that filled the shed listened breathlessly to the performance, the lovely cantabile passages, from the start to the coda and grand chorus of the brasses, woodwinds, strings in the swift-paced conclusion.

Dr. Koussevitzky Dominates

Dr. Koussevitzky in his usual brown for afternoon returned to the stage again and again after each piece, accepting with poise and pleasure the applause for just one of a group of distinguished concerts of the festival that opened last week and which comes to a close Sunday afternoon, August 11. The Thursday night concert this week opens Brahms week. The series concludes Sunday afternoon, August 11 with Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom" for men's voices with orchestra, and Beethoven's Ninth with Festival Chorus.

In the Berkshires setting Sunday afternoon the weather was perfect, cool in the shade, the sky clear and the hills surrounding clearly etched, the nearby lake shining in the sun of noon and afternoon, and the lovely countryside something to see by those driving cars from practically every state of the country, all of them finding easy parking space. There could easily have been ten thousand at the Festival.—M. M.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
1946

Soloists for Ninth

As a result of auditions held last week, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen four singers now studying in the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox to be the soloists in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony O chestra. The Ninth Symphony w bring the Festival to a clo under Dr. Koussevitzky's dire tion on August 11. The quart is to include Frances Yeend, sopran Eunice Alberts, contralto; Jose Laderoute, tenor; James Pease, ba The singers come from various par of the country, an indication of t diverse geographical sources of t student body of the Berkshire Mus Center. Miss Yeend is from the Sta of Washington; Miss Alberts fro Brookline, Massachusetts; Josep Laderoute from Canada; James Pea from Indiana.

The case is also announced for t three performances of "Peter Grime the opera which will have its fi American production by the Berksh Music Center at Tanglewood on Au ust 6, 7, 9. "Peter Grimes" was co posed for Tanglewood by commissi of the Koussevitzky Music Found tion. The title role will be sung alte nately by William Norne and Jose Laderoute. The leading soprano pa (Ellen) will be sung alternately Florence Manning and Frances Yeen Balstrode will be sung by Jam Pease. The cast will include: Elle Carleen, Irene Jordan, Frances Le nerts, Mildred Mueller, Phyllis Smit Duane Crossley, Paul Franke, Robe Gay, Paul Knowles, Matthew Loc hart, Robert Long, Leonard Treas Frederic Zighera.

Eric Crozier, who directed the pr duction at Sadlers Wells in Londo and Benjamin Britten, the compos of "Peter Grimes," are both on the way from England to assist in th production here. Richard Rychtari is the stage designer.

[218]

16—The Berkshire Evening Eagle, Monday, July 29, 1946

20,000 Attend Two Concerts At Tanglewood Over Week End

Weather Is at Its Best for Saturday Night and Sunday Afternoon Programs by Boston Symphony

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The first week-end trio of concerts in the big Shed at Tanglewood was completed yesterday afternoon when a near-record crowd of 9500 under a flawlessly blue sky, came to hear Serge Koussevitzky direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of Mendelssohn, Copland and Tchaikovsky. Saturday night's concert was attended by 10,500.

This first of the three week ends of concerts of the ninth Berkshire Festival, the first to be resumed under full sail since the war years' interruption, found the brilliant Boston orchestra and their peerless leader still clinging without deviation to that high standard of performance which has given Tanglewood its distinctive place among America's summer musical ventures.

The programs have been well chosen and organized. Yesterday afternoon one of Aaron Copland's latest compositions "Appalachian Spring" was heard, and on the opening Thursday evening program, there had been the first American performance of the Shostakovitch ninth symphony.

Weather Benevolent

The weather, which always figures in reports of Tanglewood concerts, could not have been more benevolent. A trifle on the cool side on both Thursday and Saturday evenings, but crystal clear on all three concert times both for comfort and convenience in approaching the expansive grounds, and ideal for tone conveyance from the stage. Traffic and seating arrangement "bugs" had been largely eliminated after the first concert. Audiences started arriving, as usual, much before concert time, many bringing picnic lunches, and yesterday bringing baskets of lunch to eat after the concert. The broad lawn behind the Shed yesterday was covered with a kaleidoscopic and thick sprinkling of music-lovers, stretched or sitting on rugs and blankets in every conceivable costume and posture.

Copland's suite from the ballet "Appalachian Spring" is a late work of the unofficial but conceded dean of a certain wing of the American school of composition. Yesterday's entry is an apt example of his right and title to be so regarded. It is both beautiful music, per se, and at the same time conspicuously successful in its suggestion of the story which it purports to delineate. The polyphony of his writing, so faithfully played by the orchestra, becomes intensely true, and we don't believe our conviction was too deeply influenced by the impression we retained of its premiere performance in the Library of Congress in 1944 on the occasion of the 80th birthday of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, upon whose commission it was written.

At that time is was played by 13 instruments and was danced by a small company headed by Martha Graham. The primitive nature of the music was matched at that time by the stage setting and the choreography, but the music, expanded into full orchestra, stands completely on its own feet without benefit or need of extraneous devices.

Indebted to Dr. Andrews

There is an additional special interest in this work to Berkshire: Mr. Copland acknowledges his indebtedness to Dr. Edward D. Andrews, a native of Pittsfield and the eminent Shaker authority, for some of the themes which he has incorporated and developed in his composition. Dr. Andrews' book of Shaker melodies, published under the title of "The Gift To Be Simple," enlisted the collaboration, for the musical portions, of Conrad Held, at that time a member of the South Mountain Quartet. The remainder of the program consisted of two proven favorites: The Mendelssohn "Italian" and the Tchaikovsky fifth symphonies.

Tchaikovsky Is Favorite

This Tchaikovsky symphony is a favorite vehicle for Serge Koussevitzky. He used it in exactly the same relative program position at the Boston Orchestra's first appearance in these Festivals, to close the Sunday and final concert of the 1936 series which at that time was confined to a single week end. As he did 10 years ago, he laid it on with a trowel and spared nothing to make his effects. But make them he did, to the nearly wild demonstration of the audience. At the end women were waving kerchiefs and programs, and pressing forward toward the stage, to say nothing of the applause and shouts of approval. The orchestra gave as much as he asked and required, and produced a variety of tone color as vivid as this reviewer can recall.

At the risk of being redundant the grace of the third (valse) movement could not be overlooked Here Koussevitzky selected a tempo and a style of marvelous charm He indicated and received an exquisitely apt tone, just as his orchestra gave him the lush and full sonorities he asked at other points of the symphony. These standard symphonies in the repertory of such an outstanding conductor as Koussevitzky may vary in the repetition to some degree, but the basic conception is communicated without too wide a variance. The brilliance of the orchestra shone through in the Mendelssohn symphony and spectacularly so in the Ravel suite on the program of the preceding night.

Saturday Night Concert

Saturday evening's concert had opened with the Beethoven "Pastoral" and proceeded, after intermission, to the Rachmaninoff second piano concerto, with Eugene List as soloist, and the Ravel second suite from "Daphnis et Chloe." The young Mr. List was making his second Berkshire appearance. The first was in recital in Pittsfield in 1939. He was not consistently adequate for the assignment Saturday night. He showed a deep sense of tonal poetry but failed at times to adjust himself dynamically to the circumstances, with the result that he did not make his playing articulate through the rich and fertile background Rachmaninoff supplies and above the full and heavy accompaniment Koussevitzky provided. He was recalled, with great enthusiasm, for the concerto, after all, is wonderfully luxuriant music, and the temptation to lay into its abundant orchestral resources is strong indeed. The total effect is richly rewarding as a whole, even though the soloist was buried so much of the time.

This much of the Festival must be counted an unqualified success. The programs have been wisely chosen with a gratifying number of new and contemporary works. Is it not in this direction that the future of Tanglewood should be pointed? There are still to come some exciting new American works, and the Berkshire Music Center's production of the new opera "Peter Grimes," is a tremendously important event. The continuation of this policy could well establish Tanglewood as the center offering the most support and encouragement to new compositions and as the institution whose imprimatur would be most highly honored and coveted throughout the musical world.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JUL 29 1946

Music

Berkshire Symphonies Heard by 28,000

Music Lovers Idolize Conductor Dr. Koussevitzky

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., July 28.—Last night's and this afternoon's concerts at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival each boasted an attendance of 10,000 or more. This was a good 2000 over the figure of opening night listeners, so that the total, thus far, is 28,000 in paid admissions.

This afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky, in a bright and brown pin-striped suit, led his Boston Symphony hosts through a three-part program. He looked very dapper, and very evidently felt so, as he unreeled the well-known gymnastics of his conducting style.

Some 10 minutes before the concert, a screaming siren brought many of the listeners running to the road which leads to the music shed. Everybody knew, of course, that the commotion came from a police car escorting the famous batonist to his niche. But everybody had to look. Quite a production!

A Change Suggested.

When Dr. Koussevitzky came out on the stage there was the usual ovation. This man is positively idolized in these gentle hills, and changing the name of the series to the Koussevitzky Music Festival might be more in the spirit of things.

Anyway, the program began with the "Italian" Symphony of Mendelssohn, who, by the way, was never satisfied with this work. Whatever the faults he discovered in it—be they real or, as Tovey suggests, imaginary—it is one of the composer's most popular symphonic compositions. Charm and refinement it has in carloads, and the spirit of the whole piece is not alien to its "Italian" titling.

The performance, after a cumbersome beginning, went quite well, the concluding Saltarello, in particular, getting exactly the tempo it wants, plus a light and graceful handling of the teeming dance notes.

Best of Afternoon.

Aaron Copland's perfectly swell Suite from the ballet "Appalachian Spring" was the best played score of the afternoon. It's not an easy number to do, and I thought that one craggy sequence of syncopation had everyone's heart in his mouth—or so it should have been—with the threatening near-misses, or worse. Nothing of a serious nature happened, however, for the reading was little short of miraculous.

Maybe Tschaikowsky is Dr. Koussevitzy's pet composer. The good Doctor really bears down on him. So much so, in fact, that the good Piotr Ilyitch sounds like an entirely different music maker when anybody else conducts him.

For this listener Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony was the least happily performed of the three items scheduled. The conductor—perhaps, it was a mirage—seemed too busy "acting" before his devoted fans to get to the unvarnished truth of the music. And the result was a sometimes slovenly, sometimes heavily retarded rendering of a work that could do with a lot less personalized treatment.

List in Solo.

On Saturday night Eugene List, purveyor to their democratic majesties of neo-Potsdam, played the solo part in the C minor Piano Concerto of Rachmaninoff. I was only too pregnantly aware of his fine lyrical conception of the piece, and yet I could have regretted that the songfulness took a despotic precedence over everything else. The pianist's performance was scaled down to salon miniatures even where it required thundering tone and sharp dynamic contrasts.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, which came to life in the thunderstorm and stayed that way till the end, and the Second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite of Ravel—magnificently done—were the other numbers.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
JUL 29 1946

Weather and Boston Symphony In Fine Form at Tanglewood

Copland's 'Appalachian Spring' Interesting Contrast Between Mendelssohn, Tschaikowsky Smphonies; 21,000 at Weekend Programs

By JOHN D. DONOGHUE

Lenox, July 29—The Boston symphony orchestra and the weather were in magnificent form for the weekend concerts which brought the first week of the first postwar Berkshire symphony festival to a close. Dr Koussevitzky elicited support from the men even above the usual full measure expected from the Bostonians.

Yesterday afternoon's program which attracted 10,000 to the Tanglewoood shed and lawn was a balanced, interesting program which featured the Mendelssohn "Italian" symphony, the Copland ballet suite "Applachian Spring," and the Tschaikowsky Fifth symphony. Saturday night, an enraptured audience of 11,000 at Tanglewood, plus uncounted millions of radio listeners, heard youthful Eugene List as an inspired soloist in the Second Rachmaninoff piano concerto, and the Ravel second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite. The program opened with the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony which, like the Ravel, is one of the orchestras sure fire favorites.

The program yesterday, which included three of our own special favorites, seemed to have won a few other devotees, in view of the prolonged clapping and handkerchief waving that greeted the end of each work. The Mendelssohn glowed. It is a work ideally suited to start a program. It starts vivace; the andant is con moto and, although the third movement is marked con moto moderato, it gallops off to a tingling finale with a daltarello and presto. It is one of the most perfectly constructed of symphonies, easy to listen to for the tyro, and a joy in offering to its old friends new charms everytime it is unfolded by the Boston orchestra.

Copland Premiere

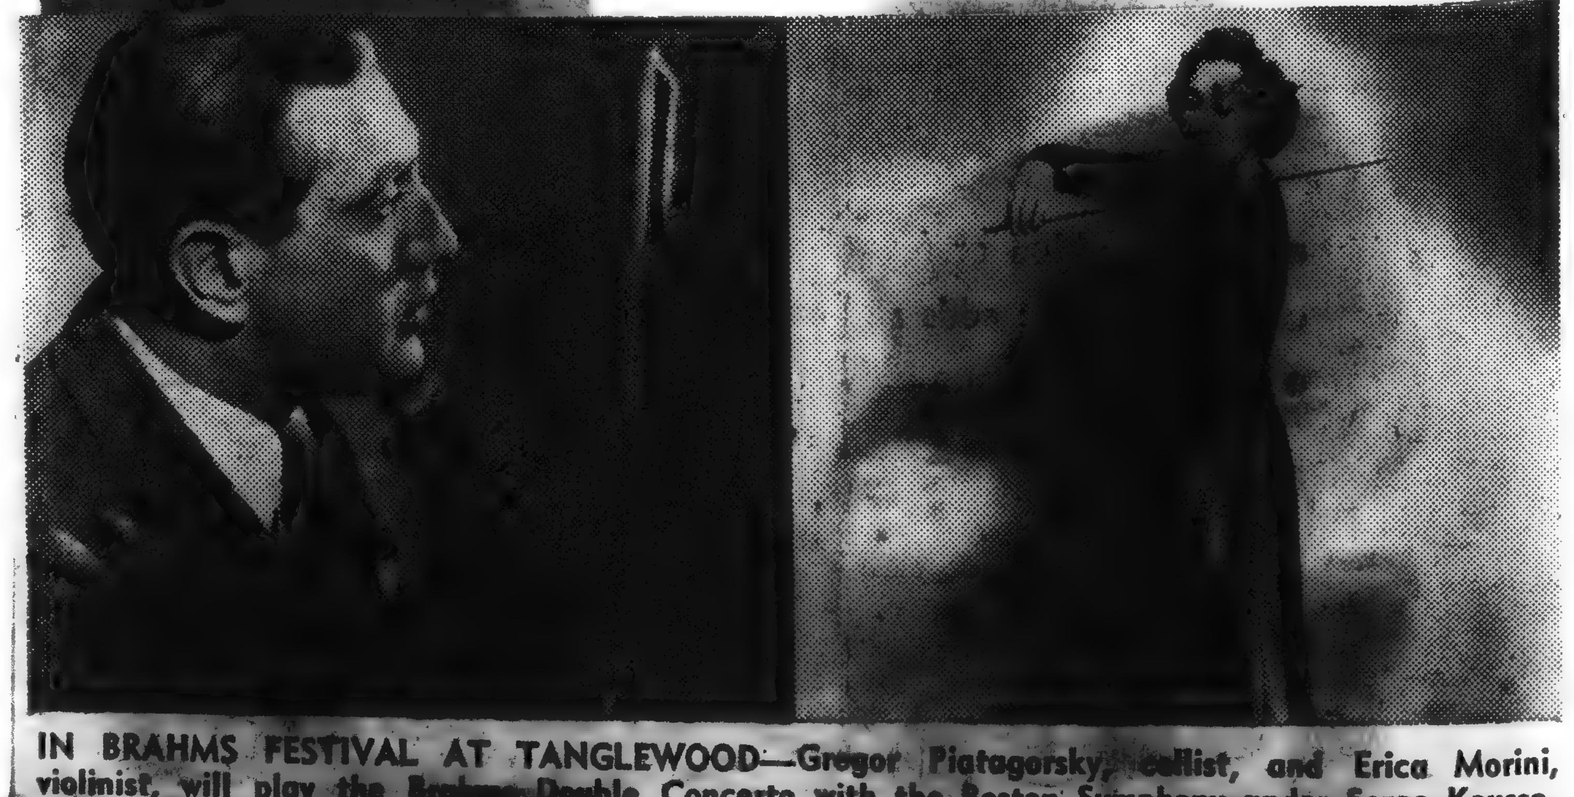
For contrast before the Tschaikowsky, there was the premiere at Tanglewood of the "Applachian Spring" score by Aaron Copland who is Dr Koussevitzky's assistant as director of the Berkshire Music center. The composer was on hand yesterday to share in the well deserved plaudits.

The Boston orchestra has recorded it, and it has become one of our disced favorites. Written for Martha Graham and commissioned by Mrs Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, it is the setting for a story of pioneer courage by a young couple. There is some wonderfully romantic music to suggest the bride and her hsband, and some perky tunes to let the audience in on the humor of folk dancing. The finale produced one of the most memorable pianissimos we can remember. Though it would be more effective with the dancers, the score is a most promising addition to the symphonic literature. It has good times and the orchestration is most imaginative.

As for the Tschaikowsky, well, it was Koussevitzky at his best. The tunes Tin Pan alley has borrowed still shone through their tarnish, while the triumphant motto theme that sounds like an anthem gave the work a thrilling finale.

This coming week will be devoted to entirely to the work of Brahms. Thursday night at 8.15, the program will include the "Tragic" Overture; the First Piano concerto with Claudio Arrau as soloist; and the Fourth symphony.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JUL 29 1946



IN BRAHMS FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD—Gregor Piatagorsky, cellist, and Erica Morini, violinist, will play the Brahms Double Concerto with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky's direction Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood, Mass. The three Brahms programs, Thursday, Saturday and Sunday, will include all four symphonies, Tragic Overture, First Piano Concerto, Haydn variations and Alto Rhapsody.

July 29

Tanglewood Hasn't Changed Much, Reporter Discovers

Even the Faces of 'Celebrities' Are The Same and as Familiar as Admirals And Generals of World War II

It's the same old story at Tanglewood where 28,000 music lovers from all over the world flocked for the first series of concerts at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival which will continue for the next two week ends.

The concert program yesterday afternoon attracted 9500 people, which number, to the surprise of many, was 500 fewer than attended Saturday night's event.

The week-end weather was ideal. Hundreds of spectators, including many tourists who have been attracted to the Berkshires for the greatest outdoor musical show in the East, took advantage of the pleasant sun-baked terraces to picnic and inspect the grounds which command a picturesque view of beautiful Lake Mahkeenac before the concerts.

A casual stroll through the Shed revealed nothing new, except perhaps a reflection to the 1934 days when the Festival was born in a horse show ring at the old Dan Hanna estate in near-by Interlaken where the late Dr. Henry Hadley conducted a hand-picked group of musicians in "music under the moon."

Seated with the 516 patrons in the box section of the Shed, built by Joseph Franz of Stockbridge who witnessed the program from the "red section," was John Shepard Jr., of Lenox, who gave the Festival the 516 beach or deck chairs which help to add color to the interior.

Even 'Celebrities' the Same

Veteran "tipsters" had little to offer in the line of exciting news because the faces of celebrities pointed out by them were as familiar as the generals and admirals who carried us successfully through World War II.

Willard M. Sistaire and his crew of ushers, usherettes, ticket takers and groundsmen did their usual commendable job. The state police, civilian traffic men, chauffeurs, book salesmen and refreshment countermen seemed to assume their former positions and execute their jobs with the same cues they followed in the seven years before the war.

Almost every possible photograph at the Festival has been exhausted on the ground, so The Eagle soared into space yesterday afternoon with its cameraman to record the 1946 story from the air.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his band of musicians graciously acknowledged the ovations of the crowds at all three concerts, leaving one with TANGLEWOOD ATWITTER: The forthcoming production [illegible] is a main topic of conversation at the Berkshire Music Center these days. Boris Gold[illegible] of the opera department, is his own accompanist as he directs a scene from the new [illegible] its U.S. premiere the final week of the Berkshire Festival.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 29 194[illegible]

20,000 Attend Two Concerts At Tanglewood

Fine Weather Benefits First Series of Festival; Cast of 'Peter Grimes' Named

By Frank D. Perkins

LENOX, Mass., July 28.—Nearly 20,000 persons heard the second and third concerts of the ninth Berkshire Festival here at Tanglewood last night and this afternoon. The music shed itself with 6,000 seats had been sold out in advance. Four thousand persons listened outside it under the stars last night, and the crowd began to gather on the Tanglewood grounds today well before the starting hour. The figures were 10,000 for yesterday and 9,500 for today.

Yesterday's concert, with Eugene List as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, presented familiar music. . . . Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto in C minor and the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe."

Today Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra offered three more well-known works, Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony and Aaron Copland's suite from "Appalachian Spring."

Mr. List was enthusiastically applauded after the Rachmaninoff concerto by the conductor and orchestra as well as by the audience. From a technical standpoint his playing was admirable, with consistent clarity and accuracy and finesse of shading, which were maintained in the swiftest passages. But from an expressive point of view his interpretation seemed to be on a limited scale. That the piano part was not always heard in its full sonority might have been due to the position of the piano, but there also seemed to be a certain lack of emotional drive, a frequent understatement of the outspoken romantic eloquence of this work.

The pianist was most expressively persuasive in some of the softer, more meditative measures of the music.

Close With Ravel Suite

The orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky gave Mr. List laudable cooperation, and also played well in a spirited straightforward interpretation of the "Pastoral" symphony. The Ravel suite has always been among the Boston Symphony's most brilliant and effective vehicles. and this performance gave the concert a duly climactic close.

Mr. Copeland, who is assistant director of the Berkshire Music Center, shared bows with Dr. Koussevitzky after today's performance of his "Appalachian Spring." The ballet for which this was composed was first performed only fourteen months ago, but this concert suite has by now become one of the best known American works in the orchestral repertoire; it has been played by most of this country's major symphonic organizations. It wears well on repeated hearings, and today's performance was of the first order, revealing all the color and distinctly American savor of the music.

The performance of the melodious Mendelssohn symphony had an infectious freshness and vitality, and the interpretation of the Tchaikowsky symphony reflected Dr. Koussevitzky's essential understanding of this composer's music. This concert closed the first series of the festival, which has been benefited by fine weather. The second series next Thursday, Saturday and Sunday will be devoted to nine works of Brahms.

The cast was announced yesterday for the first American performances of Benjamin Britten's opera "Peter Grimes," which will be given at Tanglewood by the Berkshire Music Center on August 6, 7 and 9. William Horne and Joseph Laderoute will alternate in the title role, and Florence Manning and Frances Yeend in the leading soprano role of Ellen. James Pease will sing Balstrode and Ellen Carleen, Irene Jordan, Frances Lehnerth, Mildred Mueller, Phyllis Smith, Duane Crossley, Paul Franke, Robert Gay, Paul Knowles, Matthew Lockhart, Robert Long, Leonard Treash and Frederic Zighera will also be in the cast. The composer and Eric Crozier, who directed the London production at Sadlers Wells last year, will assist in this production.

In the closing concert of the Berkshire Festival on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 11, the soloists in Beethoven's ninth symphony will be Miss Yeend, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, Mr. Laderoute tenor, and James Pease, bass.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

JUL 29 1946

Subsidize Our Artists

Maybe it was merely to make hot-weather conversation, but Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, distinguished orchestra conductor, seemed very much in earnest recently when he reopened the old argument as to whether the fine arts, including music, ought to be subsidized by public funds in this country. Dr. Koussevitzky gives an emphatic yes to that issue.

Art, he said, "needs the support of the state, and demands a department of fine arts." In ignoring the arts, he insists, "the state will inevitably lose the sustaining interest and influence of the foremost minds and the creative spiritual forces of the nation."

Dr. Koussevitzky knows, of course, that great art is not created by government, although there is something to be said—and has been many times—for a department of fine arts in the Federal government, through which encouragement could be made effective for amateur artistic effort. The fact that many of the old countries have state-operated musical and art institutions and support operas and orchestras does not mean that this country ought to follow suit. Private initiative and support in this field, as in others, works best here.

The ideal way for a democracy to handle this matter, Dr. Koussevitzky could find right here in Rochester. Here the people themselves, through the Civic Music Association, make their own musical policy by contributing voluntarily to a common fund. There is no political pressure, no regimentation, no favoritism in that system. This is "subsidy" as it should be—provided by the free gifts of individuals who admire art for its own sake.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 29 1946

Weekend Concerts Draw Thousands at Tanglewood

Special to The Hartford Times

Lenox, Mass. — To hear the first violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchstra attack the opening theme of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony is one of the happiest musical experiences of civilized man. This wedding of urbanity and joyousness was an ideal which existed only in the brain of the composer until our own time produced Dr. Koussevitzky and what ~~is probably the greatest~~ orchestral technique the world has ever known.

Tanglewood must figure too in this concert of superlatives because there is everything about the Berkshire picture to attune the heart to mountain-top musical experience.

They come by the thousands. On Saturday night the attendance was well over 10,000 and Sunday's turn-out, with perfect weather, must have threatened the previous high record of 13,000.

Dr. Koussevitzky has drawn his programs with an eye to the broad appeal, but without compromising with the superficial. This pair of concerts brought out two of the handsomest scores in his voluminous repertory—Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Second Suite and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, both of them Tanglewood favorites—the kind of tonal gorgeousness and melodic riches that reach affectingly the countless listeners on the broad lawns outside the periphery of the Music Shed.

* * *

NOT MANY OTHER leaders of summertime concerts would be bold enough to program such a work as Copland's ballet suite "Appalachian Spring." This is not popular music in any sense of the word. It demands attentive listening if anything is to be gotten out of it. A little girl in pigtails who had sat bolt upright through three-quarters of it finally began to yawn and an elderly man with the stamp of business about him was fidgeting with his cold cigar before it was over.

But by and large this modern ballet score was given its chance and did register to the extent that the composer was given a ringing ovation when Koussevitzky persuaded him to come to the stage.

We heard the Appalachian music in Bushnell Memorial last winter and a second hearing, apart from recorded ones, does not importantly modify first judgment. It is still long for what it contains, an impression which choreographic realization would perhaps eliminate. I continue to find it highly atmospheric, evocative of rural and primitive imagery. Both the opening and the closing pages are inspired and of mesmeric power. What a marvelous interpretation Dr. Koussevitzky gave them! The pages between have their longueurs, rely upon novelty rhythmic effects and some rather scholastic counterpoint, but in spite of that we have in this suite one of Copland's finest efforts.

* * *

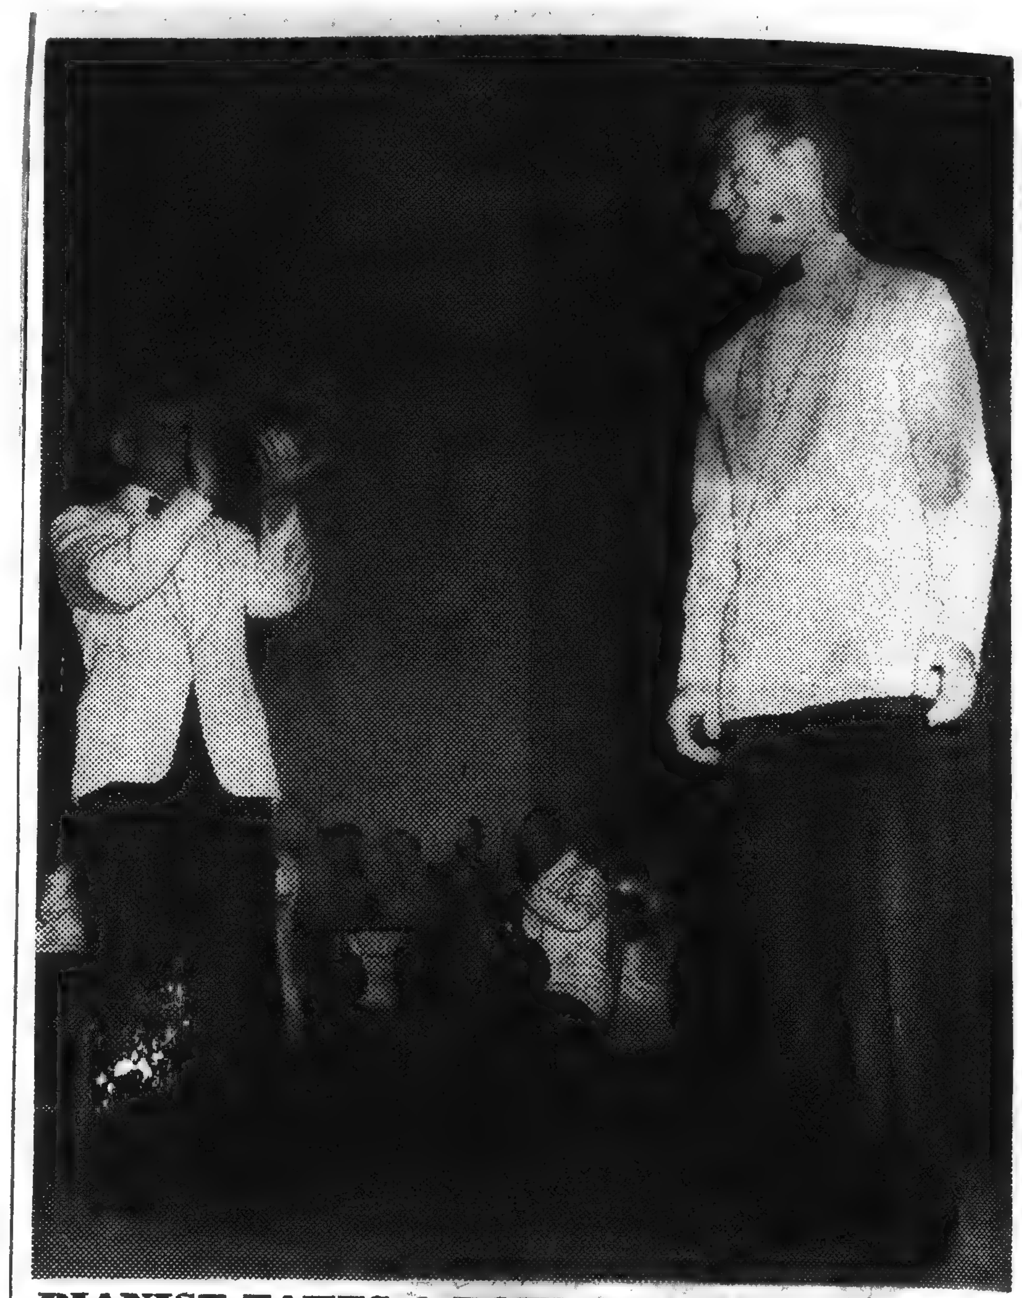
EUGENE LIST, the young sergeant who came in for international attention when he played for the Allied leaders at Potsdam, was the hero of Saturday night's concert. He was soloist in Rachmaninoff's C minor Concerto, another of those sensuous, singing scores which come into singularly beautiful existence in the Bostonians' Arcadia.

List has a powerful tone and a virile approach to the piano but Koussevitzky unleashed the full flood of his magnificent orchestra and the result was anything but an accompaniment. I am not sure that it should be. This Concerto is symphonic in texture and scope. Its melodies are warm and richly colored. Romantic to the core, it was given a splendidly romantic performance but one with only a modicum of sentiment.

The Pastoral Symphony is another Tanglewood standby which on Saturday night had a presentation which ranked with the Eroica of Thursday night. It was beautifully poised, exquisite in detail, even some of its bucolic suggestions having been carefully groomed. It is good to have such a classic as the Pastorial purged of the fantastic connotations which it picked up when it was filmed some years ago.

C. E. L.

EAGLE'S WINGS OVER TANGLEWOOD: While 9500 persons attended yesterday afternoon's concert at the Tanglewood Shed, The Eagle's photographer struck a new high note as he soared overhead for pictures. Many of the patrons can be seen on the lawns that surround the Shed. (Jay C. Rosenfeld's review of the concerts will be found on the last page).



PIANIST TAKES A BOW: Eugene List, who appeared as soloist at the Berkshire Festival Saturday night, accepts the plaudits of the audience and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JUL 29 1946

30,000 At Boston Symphony Opening Concerts at Lenox

By Staff Correspondent

LENOX, July 29.—The past weekend, the Tanglewood Shed with its six thousand capacity and the huge surrounding grounds have been thronged with thirty thousand spectators to hear the three opening concerts of the ninth Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

For the first time in five years, the opening concerts have been favored with perfect weather. The only soloist of the opening series (Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon) was Eugene List, young American pianist. The Ex-Army Sergeant of Pottsdam fame received an ovation for his playing of Rachmaninoff's "Concerto No. 2, in C minor" at the Saturday concert.

Each of the three events attracted an unusually large number of celebrities. Among them were Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, Lady Berenson of New Zealand, and H. V. Kaltenborn.

Royalty was represented by Prince and Princess Ladislas Sapieha, and her mother Baroness Louise Bornemixza, Princess Toussoun of Egypt, Baroness Humbert de Viry of Shipton Court, Countess Max de Foras, and Princess Diane R. Eristavi.

Notable Reservations

Included among the reservations which have sold out the entire series of nine concerts are those of Jimmy Cagney, Walter Winchell, Vincent Sheean, Joseph P. Kennedy, Clare Luce, Mrs. Myron Taylor and a host of top-flight musicians.

Last Thursday night's program included the first American performance of Shostakovich's "Ninth Symphony." Compared to the seventh and eight symphonies by the same composer it is gay, almost frolicsome. It was not received with the enthusiasm that the seventh symphony received here in 1941, but it was nevertheless given a warm reception.

Another first American performance will be that of the opera, "Peter Grimes" by the English composer Benjamin Britten on August 6. Britten and Eric Crozier, who directed the world premier in London, are on their way from England to supervise the production.

Frances Yeend, who sang in the "Messiah" in Worcester two seasons ago, Joseph Laderoute, who has been heard in Worcester with the Connecticut Opera Company, and James Pease, who is to sing at the forthcoming Worcester Festival, [illegible] leading roles in "Peter [illegible]

More than [illegible] students have en[illegible]shire Music C[illegible] with its world-famed [illegible]. About eighty are from Massachusetts and Worcester is represented by Wayne Barrington, son of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Barrington of 11 Perkins street. The enrollment is from coast-to-coast, with Canada and South America well represented.

Brahm's Festival

Next week-end (Aug. 1, 3, 4) is to be a Brahms festival with the following soloists: Claudio Arrau, pianist; Carol Brice, contralto; Erica Morini, violinist; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist.

The final series (Aug. 8, 10, 11) will consist of miscellaneous works, Piatigorsky again as soloist, and Mischa Elman playing the Martinu violin concerto.

Some idea of the importance of the Berkshire Festival opening last Thursday [illegible] was indicated by the presence of thirty-two music critics [illegible] all over the United States. Among improvements made at Tanglewood this year is a new press room near the entrance which is amply supplied with typewriters and direct wires to the various newspapers.

Science, Invention and The Music Festival

The reported invention of a noiseless paper bag will be welcomed by movie and theatre-goers and others who are subject to the annoyance of losing the best lines in the crackle of paper or cellophane when a near-by seat-holder reaches for a sweet. If the inventor will proceed from his present triumph to devising noiseless peanuts, crunchless popcorn, or possibly an adaptation of the Maxim silencer designed to fit any mouth, he will rate a statue in front of the Capitol at Washington and an oversized niche in the Hall of Fame.

Even these devices would not eliminate all the distractions that beset those who go to an aural entertainment for the sole purpose of listening to it. It might be thought that the Shed at Tanglewood would contain only those who knew and loved music and desired to hear it. The fact that there has been applause at inappropriate points in the programs of the first few days is proof that not all of the audience belong to the cognoscenti. The buzz of conversation audible in pauses, which has several times delayed the beginning of the next movement, seems to indicate that some of those present consider Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony to have the same function as the orchestra in a restaurant—to provide musical background for the verbal exchange of ideas. As nuisances, these gentry vie with those whose alarm clocks are out of order and whose late arrival entails a five-minute interruption in the first offering on the program.

The Tanglewood Festival is not, like the opera of old, principally or even secondarily a social event. It was instituted and is continued for people interested in listening to the best music. The interests of music-lovers is paramount, and those whose attention is elsewhere or who do not care for a particular selection should either stay away or have the grace to keep quiet.

Tonight's Concert At Tanglewood Is Postponed

The concert planned for tonight at Tanglewood by the chamber music and madrigal groups of the Berkshire Music Center will be omitted. The week's schedule of events by students of the school, open to the Friends of the Center, otherwise remains as announced.

Tomorrow evening at 8.15 the orchestra of Department 5 will give a symphony concert, conducted by Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who directs the department. Tomorrow afternoon at 4.30 in the chamber music hall Edward Weeks, Atlantic Monthly editor, will lecture. Scenes from operas will be presented Wednesday evening, a concert by the Department 5 orchestra Thursday afternoon and one by Department 2 orchestra Friday evening. Saturday afternoon at 2.30, Robert Shaw will conduct the choral group in a concert in Trinity Church, Lenox.

A second public rehearsal of the Boston Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will be held Saturday morning at 10.

The program for tomorrow night's concert follows

Concerto Grosso in D minor .... Handel
A Night on Bald Mountain . Moussorgsky
Violin Concerto in E minor..Mendelssohn
Kenneth Gordon, soloist.
Symphony No. 2 in C minor (2d and 4th movements) .... Tchaikowsky

ALBANY, GA.
HERALD
JUL 30 1946

TALLAHASSEE, FLA.
DEMOCRAT
JUL 30 1946

MINOT, N. D.
NEWS
JUL 30 1946

TULARE, CALIF.
ADVANCE REGISTER
JUL 30 1946

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
JUL 30 1946

CAMBRIDGE, MD.
BANNER
JUL 30 1946

ANDERSON, IND.
HERALD
JUL 30 1946

OSSINING, N. Y.
CITIZEN-REGISTER
JUL 30 1946

WEBSTER CITY, IOWA
FREEMAN-JOURNAL
JUL 30 1946

LEWISTOWN, MONT.
MORNING DEMOCRAT-NEWS
JUL 30 1946

AUBURN, N. Y.
CITIZEN-ADVERTISER
JUL 30 1946

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
30 1946

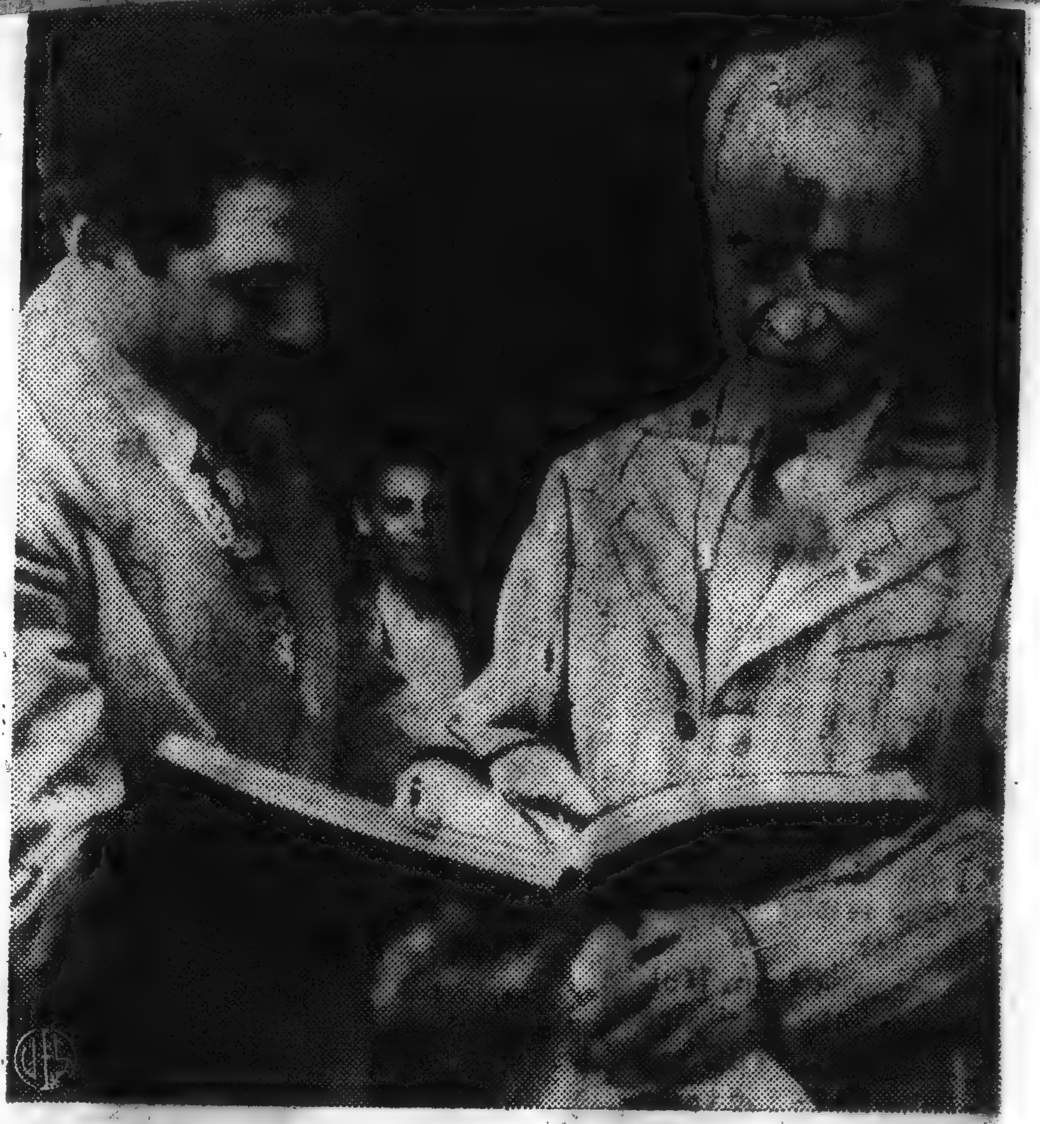
Berkshire Music Fete Thrills 28,000 Guests

One-third of the Berkshire Music festival is now glorious history with an estimated audience of 28,000 in attendance over the weekend. Saturday night's offering included the propitious Beethoven "Sixth" symphony, which absorbed the proper "pastoral" atmosphere through the al fresco setting of the "Tanglewood" music shed. Needless to say, Dr. Koussevitzky and the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra gave a reading and rendition of the work which was perfection. Eugene List, who won distinction at Potsdam where he played for Truman, Churchill and Stalin, was the dynamic projectionist of the Rachmanioff piano concerto No. 2, and barring, at times, during the first movement, a preponderance of orchestral power, emerged triumphantly as a tone painter and technician of vortuoso proportions. The orchestra in Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suits brought the Saturday night concert to a brilliant conclusion with Dr. Koussevitzky taking every advantage of the great color and dynamic range of the orchestra to bring a cheering hysterical audience to its feet at its conclusion.

Sunday afternoon's concert included the sparkling "Italian" symphony by Mendelssohn, exquisitely played; the interesting suite from the ballet "Appalachian Spring" by the contemporary American composer, Aaron Copland, who was brought to the stage at its stunning conclusion to share honors with the conductor, and a superb performance of the Tchaikowsky "Fifth" symphony as only the Russian conductor can spark the works of his native land. There was musical exaltation in every movement of his articulate hand and suffering his expressive face. He is a stickler for giving the inner parts individualistic treatment with the result that as many times as the conductor has played this most cheerful work of the great Russian composer, and as many times as the members of the audience have heard it in the past, it emerged as something new, fresh virile and tremendously exciting.

NILES, OHIO
TIMES
JUL 30 1946

COLUSA, CAL.
SUN-HERALD
JUL 31 1946



FESTIVAL SINGER—William Horne, left, tenor selected by Serge Koussevitzky to sing title role in American premiere of English opera, "Peter Grimes," at Berkshire music festival goes over the score with Dr. Koussevitzky. The presentation of the opera is considered one of the year's most important musical events. It will be given Aug. 6.

EDINBURG, TEXAS
VALLEY REVIEW
JUL 31 1946

HOBART, OKLA.
DEMOCRAT-CHIEF
AUG 1 1946

GALVESTON, TEXAS
TRIBUNE
AUG 1 1946

Tanglewood Impresses Hammerstein

Sees Background Of Broadway Musical Possible

LENOX—[illegible]wood may one day serve [illegible] background for a Broadway [illegible] Oscar Hammerstein 2d, [illegible] wrote such hit shows as "Ok[illegible]," "The Desert Song," and "Show Boat," should get the urge [illegible] write a book and lyrics based on his first impressions of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival over the week end.

Mr. Hammerstein, who drove to Lenox with Mrs. Hammerstein for the first concert series, was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Stefan Lorant of "Merrywood."

Before leaving for his home in Doylestown, Pa., the noted collaborator on many musical plays said he doesn't know of "anything existing in the country which is as wonderful as Tanglewood."

"It would make a wonderful background for a musical production," he asserted, adding, "I certainly would like to see it done."

Asked whether he meant that he was given an inspiration from his visit here to write a show with Tanglewood for a background, Mr. Hammerstein replied in the negative, stating that he did not believe in "inspirations."

Hopes to Return

However, he hoped to return "as soon as possible" to the Berkshires to attend at least part of the remaining concerts in the Shed.

"Like all newcomers, I want to return year after year to listen to this wonderful music and to follow the progress of the Festival," he declared.

Mr. and Mrs. Hammerstein remained at "Merrywood" when they were not at Tanglewood. They both agreed that the hospitality of their host, Mr. Lorant, a refugee writer, who is a devotee and biographer of Abraham Lincoln, "kept us right here and while there are many other beautiful sights in the Berkshires we had to postpone them this time until another visit."

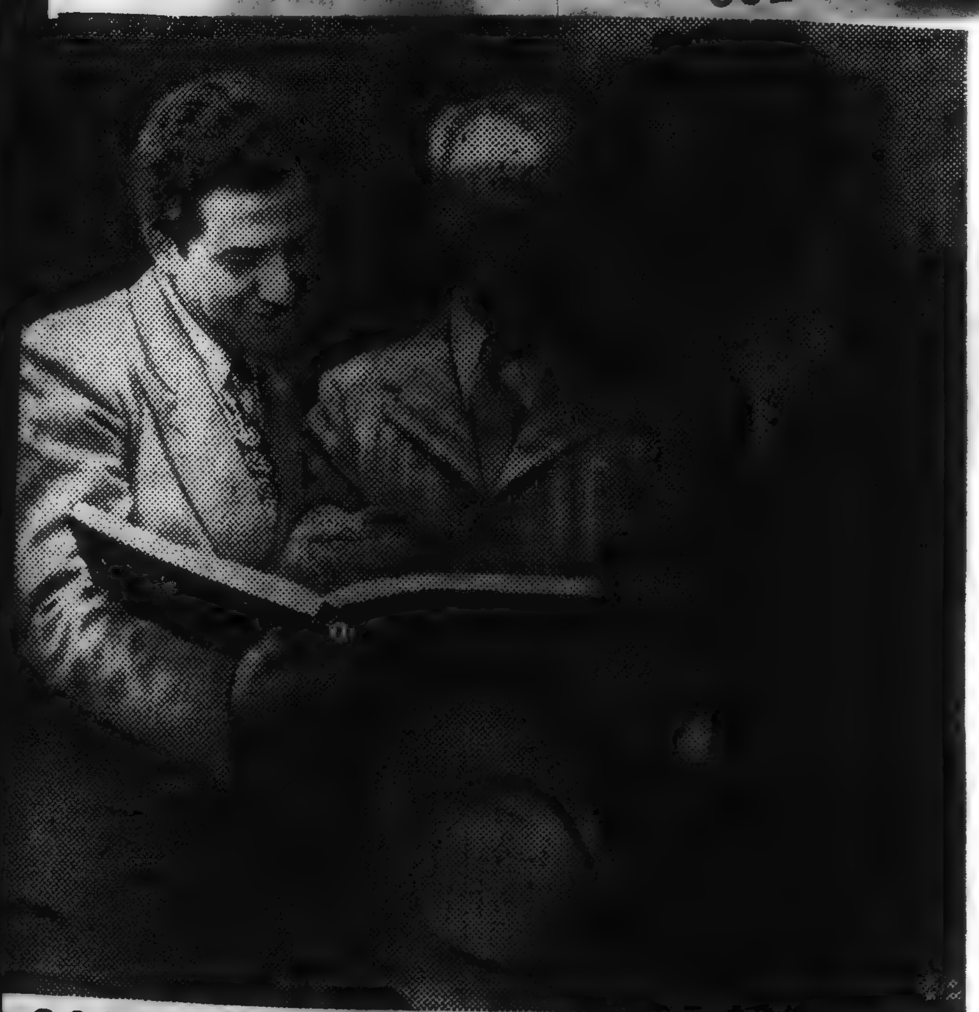
Mr. Hammerstein adapted "Show Boat" for motion pictures and collaborated on lyrics for many other screen successes. He also wrote lyrics for many songs, the best known being "Ol' Man River," "Lover Come Back to Me," "When I Grow Too Old to Dream," "All the Things You Are," "The Last Time I Saw Paris," and in collaboration, "The Indian Love Call," "Who," and "One Alone."

Oscar Hammerstein 2d, librettist of "Oklahoma" and other musicals, is the guest of Stefan Lorant, author, at Merrywood, Lenox.

WARREN, OHIO
TRIBUNE-CHRONICLE
JUL 30 1946

TARRYTOWN, N. Y.
NEWS
JUL 30 1946

HENDERSON, KY.
EVENING JOURNAL
JUL 30 1946



GOING OVER SCORE—Tenor William Horne, (left) selected by Serge Koussevitzky (center) to sing the title role in the American premiere of the English opera, "Peter Grimes," at the Berkshire festival, Tanglewood, Mass., goes over the score with Dr. Koussevitzky and Leonard Bernstein, conductor of the premiere performance.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JUL 30 1946

Soloists Chosen By Koussevitzky

As a result of auditions held last week, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen four singers now studying in the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox to be soloists in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony Orchestra.

The Ninth Symphony will bring the festival to a close under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction Aug. 11. The quartet is to include Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor; James Pease, bass. These singers come from various parts of the country, an indication of the diverse geographical sources of the student body of the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Yeend is from the State of Washington: Miss Alberts from Brookline, Mass.; Joseph Laderoute from Canada; James Pease from Indiana.

The cast is also announced for the three performances of "Peter Grimes," the opera which will have its first American production by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood on Aug. 6, 7, 9. "Peter Grimes" was composed for Tanglewood by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation.

The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute. The leading soprano part (Ellen) will be sung alternately by Florence Manning and Frances Yeend. Balstrode will be sung by James Pease. The cast will include: Ellen Carleen, Irene Jordan, Frances Lehnerts, Mildred Mueller, Phyllis Smith, Duane Crossley, Paul Franke, Robert Gay, Paul Knowles, Mathew Lockhart, Robert Long, Leonard Treash, Frederic Zighera.

Eric Crozier, who directed the production at Sadlers Wells in London, and Benjamin Britten the composer of "Peter Grimes," are both on their way from England to assist in the production here. Richard Rychtarik is the stage designer.

[222]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

WILMINGTON, N. C.
NEWS
JUL 31 1946

HENDERSON, KY.
GLEANER
JUL 31 1946

BARTLESVILLE, OKLA.
EXAMINER
JUL 31 1946

JUL 31

DURHAM, N. C.
SUN
JUL 31 1946

IRON MOU[illegible] MICH.
[illegible]
JUL 31 1946

SHEFFIELD, ALA.
TRI CITIES DAILY
JUL 31 1946

NEW CASTLE, IND.
COURIER-TIMES
JUL 31 1946

RADFORD, VA.
STAR
JUL [illegible]

DEADWOOD, S. D.
PIONEER TIMES
JUL 31 1946

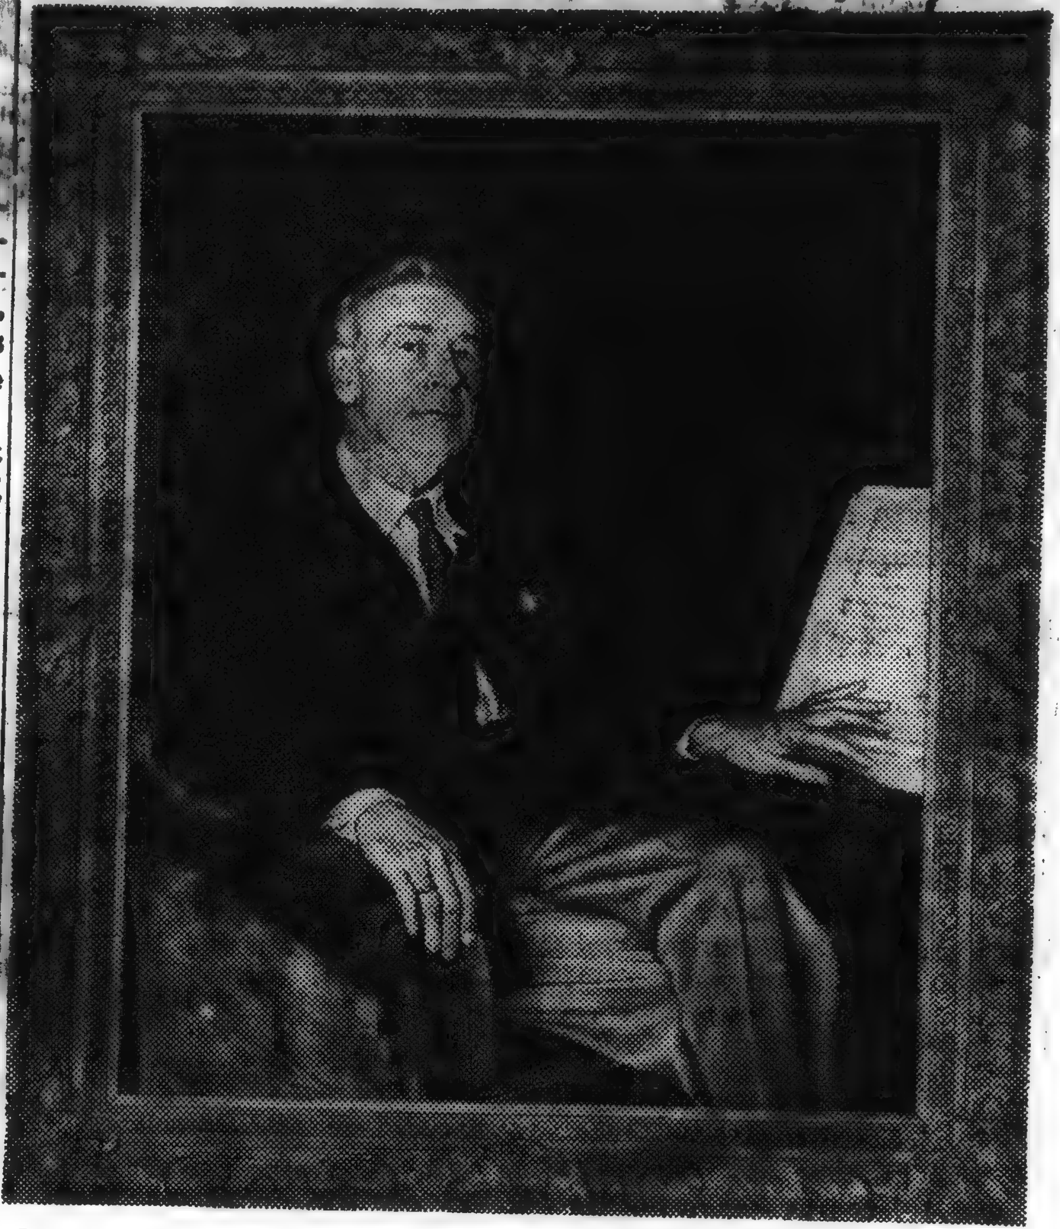
HAYS, KAN.
NEWS
JUL 31 1946

COFFE[illegible]
JUL [illegible] 1946

FLORENCE, ALA.
TIMES
JUL 31 1946

Koussevitzky, in Person and on Canvas, On Berkshire Museum Program This Week

Conductor To Speak on Members' Night



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as portrayed by Boris Chaliapin, artist noted for his Time Magazine covers.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, plays an important role in this week's program at the Berkshire Museum.

At the annual members' night Friday, Dr. Koussevitzky will give a brief address on "The Future of Tanglewood." He also figures frequently in an exhibition of pictures illustrating the history of the Boston Symphony. Notable in the collection is a portrait of the famous conductor painted by Boris Chaliapin, who is best known for his cover portraits for Time Magazine. The Koussevitzky portrait was painted in 1943 at the Koussevitzky home, Serenak, overlooking Stockbridge Bowl. The exhibit, prepared by the orchestra, also includes portraits of the founder, other conductors and artists, photographs and memorabilia.

Movie at 8

The members' night program will start at 8 with a showing of a new sound motion picture in color, "Ski Three," produced by Frank H. Howard, president of the California Ski Association. Dr. Koussevitzky's talk is scheduled for 8.50.

The program also will mark the opening of a new exhibition of French Impressionist painting, including works of most of the famous members of that school.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
JUL 31 1946

NEW OPERA COMING

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass.—The first American performance of the new opera, "Peter Grimes," will be held at the Berkshire Music Center at Tangl[redacted]

Written by Benjamin Briton of London, the opera was chosen to reopen the Sadler Wells opera after the war. Eric Crozier, who directed the world premier in London, will stage the opera here.

PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS
JUL 31 1946

CONCORD, N. C.
TRIBUNE
JUL 31 1946

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JUL 31 1946

CAROL BRICE, contralto, will sing the Brahms Alto Rhapsody with male chorus and Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, Saturday ~~evening at~~ Tanglewood. All-Brahms programs are scheduled for this weekend.

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR
JUL 30 1946

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL SELECTS CASTS FOR AUGUST PROGRAMS

As a result of auditions held last week, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen four singers now studying in the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox to be the soloists in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Ninth Symphony will bring the festival to a close under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction on Aug. 11. The quartet is to include Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor; James Pease, bass. These singers come from various parts of the country, an indication of the diverse geographical sources of the student body of the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Yeend is from the state of Washington; Miss Alberts from Brookline, Massachusetts; Joseph Laderoute from Canada; James Pease from Indiana.

The cast is also announced for the three performances of "Peter Grimes", the opera which will have its first American production by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood on Aug. 6, 7, 8. "Peter Grimes" was composed for Tanglewood by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute. The leading soprano part (Ellen) will be sunk alternately by Florence Manning and Frances Yeend. Balstrode will be sung by James Pease. The cast will include: Ellen Carleen, Irene Jordan, Frances Lehnerts, Mildred Mueller, Phyllis Smith, Duane Crossley, Paul Franke, Robert Gay, Paul Knowles, Matthew Lockhart, Robert Long, Leonard Treash, Frederic Zighera.

Eric Crozier, who directed the production at Sadlers Wells in London, and Benjamin Britten, the composer of "Peter Grimes", are both on their way from England to assist in the production here. Richard Rychtarik is the stage designer.

Brahms Week To Be Feature At Tanglewood

Claudio Arrau To Be Soloist in Concerto Tomorrow

Brahms week will open at Tanglewood tomorrow night whe Serge Koussevitzky will conduc the Boston Symphony Orchestra i the first of three all-Brahms programs that he has selected for t second series of the Berkshire F tival.

Claudio Arrau

Claudio Arrau will be the solo in the piano concerto No. 1 in minor. He has interrupted a s son in South America to appear Robin Hood Dell near Philadelp Monday night, at Tanglewood morrow night and at the New Y Stadium Aug. 5.

Born in Chile, he gave his f recital in Santiago at the age 5. Impressed by his talent, Chilean government financed musical education, sending him Europe to study under Ma Krause, a pupil of Liszt. Whil student, he won the coveted L and Ibach prizes and in 1924 f place in the competition sponso in Switzerland by the Internatio Congress of Pianists. Previo he had appeared with the Bos and Chicago Symphony Orchest

Since his recital at Carnegie in 1941, Arrau has averaged appearances a year between two Americas, playing with Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, cinnati, New York, Minneap Cleveland, National, San Franci Los Angeles, Kansas City and I anapolis Orchestras. He is sai hold the world's record for c performances, playing in 12 cital, all of Bach's works for piano and clavichord, and perfo ing all of Mozart's piano work five recitals in Mexico City in e weeks, with no repeats.

Following is tomorrow eveni program for which a few seats main in the Festival Shed:

Tragic Overture, Op. 81
Piano Concerto No. 1, in D minor
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
Soloist—Claudio Arrau

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
JUL 31 1946

Composer's Prewar Picnic Companions To Hear Symphony

LENOX, July 31 (AP) — Two American University professors who attended a prewar Leningrad picnic with Dimitri Shostakovich will be listening Saturday night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents the first Western Hemisphere broadcast of the Russian composer's Ninth Symphony.

Another picknicker and onetime Shostakovich pupil, violinist Raphael Hillyer, will take part in the Berkshire symphonic festival broadcast.

The Russian-born professors, both connected with the mathematics departments of their universities, are: Dr. Louis L. Silverman, of Dartmouth, and Dr. J. A. Shohat, University of Pennsylvania. Madame Madechda Shohat, wife of the professor, is Shostakovich's aunt.

GOING OVER SCORE—Tenor William Horne, (left) selected by Serge Koussevitzky [illegible] the title role in the American premiere of the English opera, "Peter Grimes," at the Berkshire festival, Tanglewood, Mass., goes over the score with Dr. Koussevitzky and Leonard Bernstein, conductor of the premiere performance.

Berkshire Soloist

NY Times

Carol Brice, soprano, sings [illegible]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD
JUL 2 8 1946

Will Swing Influence Symphony?

By Glenn Dillard Gunn

Two contrasted schools of thought function today in America's summer symphony concerts to raise the question, "Will 'Swing' save or destroy symphony?"

At Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., and at Ravinia on Chicago's North Shore, the great orchestras of Boston and Chicago present programs that differ in no important particular from the type of art offered during the winter season. Koussevitzky keeps the Tanglewood concerts in his own firm hand. This summer, as already reported in these columns, he played Prokofieff's latest symphony as the outstanding modern work in programs otherwise predominantly classic.

At Ravinia, guest conductors share the labors of Desire Defauw, regular conductor of the Chicago Symphony. The programs are no less serious. Distinguished soloists appear at either center. Eminent chamber organizations vie with the orchestra for attention of the public. Hans Kindler was one of the most successful guests at Ravinia about the time he was founding the National Symphony in Washington, and the program he presented there was filled with the names of great composers, past and present.

* * *

IT MUST be reported that the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, and the Chicago Symphony at Ravinia maintain their artistic position in aristocratic aloofness, as contrasted with other major orchestras playing summer seasons, but with the cordial support of the general public. So great was the influx of music lovers at Tanglewood that accommodations were completely exhausted long before the season opened. Ravinia, centrally located among a group of Chicago's wealthiest suburbs, has flourished as a center of symphony, opera, and chamber music since Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony opened it in 1905.

Quite different artistic policy prevails at the summer concerts of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, the Detroit Symphony, the Los Angeles Symphony in Hollywood Bowl, or the several orchestras that serve the multitudes in Chicago's Grant Park.

These orchestras play lighter and triter examples of the European repertoire and turn to the popular music of this country for their box office appeal. The song hits of the day as established on the radio, the records, and the juke box, mingle quaintly with well worn, but none the less admirable music by Schubert, Wagner, Tschaikowsky, Mozart, or even Beethoven.

* * *

FOR THIS sort of olio the public indicates much the same appetite that it displays at Tanglewood for the Ninth Symphony of Prokofieff and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. Ravinia relaxed its standards once—but only once—to hear George Gershwin play his Concerto in F and Rhapsody in Blue. The response overwhelmed the management. Built to accommodate 3,000 the Ravinia pavilion spread another 6,000 listeners over the lawns and the lovely gardens. The latter were trampled under foot, a result that may have moved the management to return irrevocably to its highbrow standards.

Grant Park, where such eminent artists as Tibbett, Thomas, Lily Pons, and Mischa Elman have shared the stage with local luminaries, can do as it likes. The people still would come for there is no box office. The taxpayers foot the bill which amounts to about a million dollars. Chicago can thank Jimmy Petrillo for that and does, with some appreciative gestures toward Mayor Kelly and the Park Board.

* * *

THE NATIONAL SYMPHONY should have similar subvention, both summer and winter. It will never get it from Congress. But wealthy citizens who must pay up to 90 per cent of their incomes in taxes, could subtract their donations from their tax returns, and thus Uncle Sam, indirectly would endow the arts just as he endows the equipment of business and professional men—not to mention such imposing bequests as as now are left the art galleries.

The other alternative indicates the policy adopted by the summer orchestras less fortunately circumstanced than are Boston and Chicago. They must seek subvention for symphony in tinpan alley. The question as to the ultimate reaction of the "four B's"—Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, and Sowerby—upon the devotees of Frank Sinatra, Bing Crosby, Richard Rodgers, Friml, Romberg remains unanswered. Will the light summer concerts make friends for the serious winter events? If they don't, how long can the latter maintain their standards?

HAVERHILL, MASS RECORD
7/21/46

Roslyn Levine At Berkshire Center

AMESBURY, July 20—Selected as one of 300 from a list of music supervisors and students of music from all parts of the country, Miss Roslyn Levine, supervisor of music in the local public schools, is in attendance at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, where she is studying choral conducting and madrigal singing under Hugh Ross and Robert Shaw.

Miss Levine, whose soprano voice has delighted many audiences in Amesbury, has been selected to sing in the group which will present the first performance in America of Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes." Leonard Bernstein, assistant to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is directing the presentation.

This opera will be presented on August 6, 7 and 8 before an anticipated audience of 2000 people in the huge music shed at Tanglewood.

Miss Levine has also been selected as one of a group of 12 sopranos to participate in the first performance in this country of the cantata "Maissance de la Beaute" by Leurie. This will be presented on next Tuesday evening in conjunction with the Berkshire Chamber orchestra. Valentia Vishnevska will sing the leading soprano role.

In addition to singing under Hugh Ross and Robert Shaw, the local music supervisor is studying with Boris Goldovsky in operatic technique and Stanley Chapple in instrumental conducting.

The Berkshire Music Center, which resumed this year after being suspended for three years because of the war, is continuing along the original plan. Located at Tanglewood, one of the outstanding estates in the famous Berkshire Hills, the Center annually attracts thousands of music lovers from all sections of the country. The Boston Symphony orchestra continues to be the principal attraction, but the programs offered by the 300 students, including vocalists and instrumentalists, continue to grow in prestige.

Miss Levine, in writing to local friends, reports that she has never been any more busy in her life. She states that all students are either attending classes or rehearsals from 8:30 in the morning to 10 in the evening. She declared that much of what she is learning will be of value in the program she is conducting in the local schools.

One of the outstanding achievements of Miss Levine since she came to Amesbury as supervisor of music has been the development of chorus groups at both the Junior and Senior High schools.

MILLERTON, N.Y
NEWS
7/25/46

Berkshire Festival Opens Tonight At Tanglewood, Lenox

First Concert Since 1941 At Music Center

Serge Koussevitzky Will Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra

NOTABLES TO ATTEND

The Ninth Symphony By Dmitri Shostakovich To Have American Premiere

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood tonight (Thursday) in the first of nine concerts scheduled for the Berkshire Festival. Re-opening the mammoth music shed, closed because of war conditions since 1941, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will give the Ninth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovich its first performance in America.

The now world-famous festival will continue every Thursday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for three weeks, concluding on Aug. 11 with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Tonight's program will include Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3. Saturday night Eugene List will be the soloist in Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor.

For nearly three weeks the shed, seating 6,018 persons, has been sold out for this weekend and for the concert on Aug. 4. Only a few seats in boxes and in the rear rows remain for the other programs. Because of the early sell-out, a large sale of admissions to the grounds is expected. For the last concert in 1941 the audience who heard the music from the lawn surrounding the shed was larger than that inside.

The Berkshire Music Center, for which festival is the climax, is humming with activity. There are concerts nearly every day, and often two or even three. The cast for "Peter Grimes", the opera by Benjamin Britten, English composer, has been chosen from the 400 students of the school. The title role will be taken alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute of New York City. The leading soprano part will be taken alternately by Miss Frances Yeend of the State of Washington and Miss Florence Manning of New York. The first performance will be Aug. 6, and repeated Aug. 7 and 9. Like all events at the school, the opera will be open, by invitation to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. The composer and Eric Crozier, who directed the world premiere in London, are on their way from England to supervise the production.

For the quartet for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony Miss Yeend has been chosen as the soprano; Miss Eunice Alberts of Brookline, Mass., contralto; Mr. Lawrence, tenor; and James Pease, of New York, bass.

In the coming week events at Tanglewood will include, in addition to the festival concerts, a lecture on "The Art of Criticism" by Olin Downes, music editor of the New York Times tomorrow at 4:30; a public rehearsal of the Boston Orchestra, at a nominal fee for the benefit of the pension fund, Saturday morning at 10 o'clock; a choral concert Saturday at 2:30; a chamber music concert by Gregor Piatigorsky's chamber music group Sunday morning at 10:30; chamber music and madrigals Monday evening at 8:15; a symphony concert by department 5 of the school Tuesday evening; opera scenes by the opera workshop, directed by Boris Goldovsky, Wednesday evening; a second symphony concert by department 5 orchestra Thursday afternoon, and the opening of the second festival series next Thursday evening.

At tonight's concert are expected many notables, including Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Mrs. Henry Morgentha, Jr., Senator Warren Austin (Vermont) and Mrs. Austin, Mr. and Mrs. Archibald McLeish, Mrs. Owen Johnson, Mrs. Cole Porter, Mrs. Lowell Thomas and Mrs. H. C. Kaltenborn.

From this vicinity boxholders for the first festival series include: Mr. and Mrs. William C. Cannon, Salisbury; Mrs. Edwin C. Jameson, Sharon; Mrs. William Mather Lewis, Colebrook; Mrs. C. Davie Lloyd, Kinderhook; Gordon Mendelssohn, Millbrook; Mrs. Donald J. Warner and Miss Edith Scoville, Salisbury.

DALTON, MASS
PRESS
7/19/46

TANGLEWOOD

The Berkshire Festival will start at Tanglewood Thursday evening, when Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the [redacted] presentation in Amreica of Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony. Meantime the Berkshire Music Center will be the scene of six concerts before the festival opens.

Friday evening, July 19, the advanced orchestra of the school will give it's third performance in the music shed, with pupils of Dr. Koussevitsky's conducting class on the podium. The concert orchestra, scheduled for Friday evening July 26, will be postponed until August 2.

The second and last Bach-Mozart concert by the principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Dr. Koussevitsky will be given in the theater-concert hall Saturday evening and repeated Sunday afternoon at 3:00 p. m. The program will be the Brandenburg Concerts No. 2 in F Major and the Suite (Overture) in D. Major. No. 4 by Bach and Mozart's Violin Concerto in A Major, No. 5 and "Jupiter" Symhony No. 41. William Kroll will be the soloist for the Mozart concerto and members of the orchestra will be soloists for the Bach Concerto.

Tickets may be procured at Tanglewood; England Brothers' Dept Store, Pittsfield the Curtis Hotel, Lenox; the Blue Bird Sport Shop, Stockbridge; and the Chamber of Commerce Booth in Great Barrington.

The fourth and last Chamber Music Concert, under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation will be given Tuesday evening by the Berkshire Chamber Orchestra, directed by Louis Speyer.

Events by students at the school include a choral concert Saturday afternoon at 2:30 p. m. and a Chamber Music Concert Sunday morning at 10:30 a. m. by Georg Piatigorskiy's group.

All events by the school and the Coolidge concert will be open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, to which membership is by a voluntary contribution mailed to Tanglewood.

GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS
COURIER
7/25/46

Inaugural Concert Is Set for Tonight

Koussevitzky Will Conduct Boston Symphony

Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony to Have American Premier At Tanglewood.—Music Shed Reopens After Being Closed by War Since 1941.—Festival Will Conclude August 11.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood tonight in the first of nine concerts scheduled for the Berkshire Festival. Re-opening the mammoth music shed, closed because of war conditions since 1941, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will give the Ninth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovich its first performance in America.

The now world-famous festival will continue every Thursday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for three weeks, concluding August 11 with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Tonight's program will include Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3 and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Saturday night Eugene List will be the soloist in Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor.

For nearly three weeks the shed, seating 6,018 persons, has been sold out for this week-end and for the concert on August 4. Only a few seats in boxes and in the rear rows remain for the other programs. Because of the early sell-out, a large sale of admissions to the grounds is expected. For the last concert in 1942 the audience on the lawn surrounding the shed was larger than that inside.

The Berkshire Music Center, for which the festival is the climax, is humming with activity. There are concerts nearly every day, and often two, or even three. The cast for "Peter Grimes," the opera by Benjamin Britten, English composer, has been chosen from the 400 students of the school. The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute of New York city and the leading soprano part by Miss Frances Yeend of the State of Washington and Miss Florence Manning of New York. The first American presentation will be August 6 and repeated August 7 and 9. Like all events at the school, the opera will be open by invitation to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. The composer and Eric Crozier, who directed the world premiere in London, are on their way from England to supervise the production.

For the quartet for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony Miss Yeend has been selected as the soprano; Miss Eunice Alberts of Brookline, contralto; Mr. Laderoute, tenor; and James Pease of New York, bass.

In the coming week, events at Tanglewood will include, in addition to the festival concerts, a lecture on "The Art of Criticism" by Olin Downes, music editor of the New York Times, tomorrow at 4:30 p. m.; a public rehearsal of the Boston Orchestra, at a nominal fee for the benefit of the pension fund Saturday morning at 10:00 a. m.; a choral concert Saturday at 2:30 p. m.; a chamber music concert by Gregor Piatigorsky's chamber music group Sunday morning at 10:30; chamber music and madrigals Monday evening at 8:15; a symphony concert by Department 5 of the school Tuesday evening; opera scenes by the opera workshop, directed by Boris Goldovsky, Wednesday evening; a second symphony concert by Department 5 orchestra Thursday afternoon, and the opening of the second festival series next Thursday evening.

At tonight's concert many notables are expected, including Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Senator and Mrs. Warren Austin of Vermont, Mr. and Mrs. Archibald McLeish, Mrs. Owen Johnson, Mrs. Cole Porter, Mrs. Lowell Thomas and Mrs. H. C. Kaltenborn.

[224]

TUSCALOOSA, ALA.
NEWS
AUG 1 - 1946

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR
AUG 2 - 1946

AUSTIN, MINN.
HERALD
JUL 29 1946

COLUMBIA, S. C.
STATE
AUG 4 - 1946

ALBERT LEA, MINN.
TRIBUNE
AUG 3 1946

WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
PALM BEACH TIMES
AUG 4 - 1946

PORTCHESTER, N. Y.
ITEM
AUG 1 - 1946

GREENVILLE, N. C.
REFLECTOR
AUG 2 - 1946

BUTTE, MONT.
POST
AUG 1 1946

FORT DODGE, IOWA
MESSENGER-CHRONICLE
JUL 31 1946

STRASBURG, VA.
NORTHERN VIRGINIA DAILY
AUG 8 - 1946

EAU CLAIRE, WIS.
LEADER
AUG 2 1946

SALAMANCA, N. Y.
REPUBLICAN PRESS
AUG 1 - 1946

HANOVER, PA.
SUN
AUG 3 - 1946

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
AUG 5 - 1946

NORTH PLATTE, NEB.
DAILY TELEGRAPH
AUG 4 1946

SALISBURY, MD.
TIMES
AUG 5 - 1946

KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN
AUG 6 - 1946

CENTERVILLE, IOWA
IOWEGIAN CITIZEN
AUG 2 1946

MERIDEN, CONN.
JOURNAL
AUG 2 - 1946

LOCKPORT, N. Y.
UNION-SUN & JOURNAL
AUG 6 - 1946

TOPEKA, KAN.
CAPITAL
AUG 7 1946

THE NEW YORK TIMES,

Makers of Music at Tanglewood and Lewisohn Stadium

Ruth Ork

Up at the Berkshire Music Center, Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes" will have its American premiere Tuesday. William Horne (left), who sings the title role, and Leonard Bernstein (right), the conductor, discuss the score with Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Center.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Long Associated With Lenox, Pictorial Display Reveals

Evidences of the early and continued association of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Lenox and Tanglewood are on display in the pictorial history of the orchestra that will open formally tomorrow night at the Berkshire Museum. A letter from Richard C. Dixey, summer resident of Tanglewood, written in 1882, is proof of the early connection.

A portrait by John Singer Sargent of Henry Lee Higginson, founder and until 1918 chief sustainer of the orchestra, is another reminder, for Mr. Higginson, great-uncle of Mrs. John H. P. Gould, next-door neighbor of Tanglewood, was himself a summer resident of Lenox. Latest evidence is a case of current photographs of the buildings at Tanglewood, with students of the Berkshire Music Center at work and play.

Tickets Sold at Auction

The letter of Mr. Dixey, father of Mrs. Andrew H. Hepburn and brother-in-law of the late Miss Mary A. Tappan who gave their ancestral summer home to the orchestra, was no doubt an important factor in the decision of the trustees to hold an annual auction of concert tickets to do away with the struggle to get them, and the cornering by speculators and consequent high prices.

Stating that at 8 o'clock on a Saturday morning he had taken the place in line at the Music Hall of a man whom he had apparently hired to wait all night, Mr. Dixey write, "I was the 26th man. Multiplying 25 by 6 (the number of tickets allowed) I fancied my chance to get good seats excellent, as I had heard that you were not reserving over 100 seats for yourself."

Expecting to get the 251st seat, he found all the desirable seats on the floor and the front rows of the first balcony crossed off. I had to take seats in the second row for Ellen (Mrs. Dixey), Mary (Miss Tappan) and myself." He wrote that he had been offered tickets at the Parker House for $7, and accused the men working in the box office of selling 700 or 800 seats, asking that they be dismissed.

Symphony seats were sold at public auction until 1916, when that method, too, was deemed unfair, and the present system of advance sale by mail to former subscribers was adopted. As it was recently put, "Boston Symphony seats are passed on from generation to generation with the family silver and china." It is true that there is a waiting list for the more desirable locations in Symphony Hall, and that the season for Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, as for the orchestra's appearances in New York and other cities, is sold as soon as the tickets are placed on sale.

Among other letters recently discovered with Mr. Dixey's was one from Miss Ednah D. Cheney, deploring the system that required "teachers, lonely, weary women and young people who cannot afford a large price, though they appear well dressed," to pay large prices. She suggested that a section at rehearsals be reserved at double price for "old people and invalids who cannot go in the evening and cannot enter a rush for seats."

Plea Made for the Poor

Several letters asked that something be done to make it possible for, as one former orchestra player put it, "the real poor to hear this good music, as well as those who are well to do." Apparently Mr. Higginson was disturbed by the implication that the music was only for the rich, for a long letter from the young musician, dated a week later, apologized if he seemed to reflect discredit on the founder of the orchestra. "I know," he wrote, "that had it not been for you, many a heart would have gone without that higher stimulus which it did receive. Still," he persisted, "the mechanic who works all the week to support a family cannot afford to pay 50 cents for Saturday's concert. If he could afford it, he would perhaps hate to go alone."

In a letter to George Henschel, the first conductor, Fred P. Bacon of the "musical department" of the Herald, asks that the concerts be separated into a series of symphony concerts and another "for those whose education and natural tastes do not fit them for the enjoyment of the so-called 'classical' programmes." He also asks that some of the prices be reduced.

The exhibit of pictures, programs and tickets portrays the history of the orchestra from its outgrowth from the Germania Musical Society to the current season at Tanglewood. It shows the "great organ" installed in Music Hall in 1863, the conductors, including Mr. Henschel at the time he was with the orchestra in 1881-84 and as he looked when he returned from England as Sir George Henschel in 1930 to repeat the first performance of the orchestra that he had conducted 50 years before.

Among the more important exhibits are John Singer Sargent's portrait of Mr. Higginson, Boris Challapin's portrait of Dr. Koussevitzky, painted in 1943, and Donald Greason's paintings of the orchestra in action. There are photographs of all the former conductors, and in one corner sketches made at Tanglewood by Mrs. Dixey, including one of the "little red house" occupied by Nathaniel Hawthorne.

In three glass display cases are a collection of scenes of Tanglewood, of Dr. Koussevitzky conducting the orchestra, and of old tickets, programs and other memorabilia.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
JUL 31 1946

Festival Sold Out For Two Concerts

Seats Available Only fo Tomorrow Night

BRAHMS PROGRAMS

Saturday and Sunday Reservations Exhausted — Expect Many to Listen From Lawns.

All seats in the big music shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, have been sold out for two of the series of three Brahms week concerts, opening tomorrow evening, which comprise the middle series of the 1946 Berkshire Symphonic Festival season, it was announced today.

Only for the opening concert of the series tomorrow evening were seats available today; the Saturday evening and Sunday concerts have been sold out for several weeks, it was said at the Tanglewood box office. However, it was added that there is no limit to the number of general admissions that can be sold, entitling their holders to listen from the lawns surrounding the shed. At last week's opening series of concerts, which attracted audiences ranging from over 8,000 on Thursday evening up to more than 10,000 Saturday evening, there were almost as many listeners outside as inside the shed.

For tomorrow night's opening concert of the Brahms week series, offered on the eve of the 50th anniversary of the German composer's death, the Boston symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will play the Tragic overture (Opus 81), and the Fourth symphony, in E minor, and, with Claudio Arrau as soloist, the First piano concerto, in D minor. On Saturday evening the Third symphony, in F major, and the Second, in D major, and the rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, with Carol Brice as soloist and a chorus from the Berkshire Music Center assisting, will be given. The Sunday afternoon program includes the Variations on a Theme by Hayden (Opus 56a) the First symphony, in C minor, and the Concerto in A minor for violin and violincello with Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky as soloists.

The orchestra rehearsal Saturday morning at 10 o'clock will also be open to the public and the proceeds of admission charges will go to the orchestra pension fund.

Events at the Berkshire Music center, open only to members of the Society of Friends of the school, include a lecture by Olin Downes, New York Times Music editor, Friday afternoon at 4:30; a symphony concert Friday night at 8:15 by the advanced student orchestra; a choral concert Saturday afternoon at 2:30 at Trinity church, Lenox and a chamber music concert Sunday morning at 10:30.

The Associated Press reported from Lenox today that two American university professors, Dr. Louis L. Silverman of Dartmouth and Dr. J. A. Shohat of the University of Pennsylvania, who attended a prewar Leningrad picnic with Dmitri Shostakovitch, will be listening on Aug. 10 when, at the next to the last concert of the season, Shostakovitch's new Ninth symphony, given its American premiere last Thursday, is to be repeated. Dr. Shohat's wife, Madame Nadechda Shohat, is an aunt of the young Russian composer. Another member of the picnic party, Raphael Hillyer, is a member of the orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

AUG 1- 194[illegible]

WILLIAM HORNE (left), who will sing the title role in the American premiere of the English opera, Peter Grimes, at the Berkshire Festival next Tuesday, checks the score with Serge Koussevitzky and conductor Leonard Bernstein.

Globe 7/31

Pops Programs

To the Editor—I would like to lodge a protest against the type of program presented the past season by the Boston Pops Orchestra. Although the season itself was a success, the programs definitely were not.

On almost every program throughout the season, such banalities as "Holiday for Strings," "Carousel" selections and, above all, "Jingles All the Way" were presented.

What has happened to the Pops programs of old, when one could be assured of a program including Strauss waltzes, light overtures and music to which the fine orchestra does justice, instead of indulging in music far below its calibre.

Here's hoping that next year will see a return to good music again at the Pops.

CHARLES E. TANKEL.
Waltham.

Second Festival Week Opens Tonight At Tanglewood

Another capacity attendance will be on hand for the Berkshire Festival tonight when the second series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will begin. The size of the overflow depends entirely on the weatherman. The program tonight, as for the concerts Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, will be all Brahms. Claudio Arrau will be the soloist tonight in the piano concerto No. 1 in D minor. The concert will start at 8.15.

MUSIC

Pops Orchestra Records Music of Movie "Duel in the Sun" for Victor

BY CYRUS DURGIN

The reason there was no Esplanade Concert last night and there will be one tonight instead, was that Arthur Fiedler and the orchestra yesterday spent the whole day recording at Symphony Hall.

They were putting movie music on discs, almost the whole of Dimitri Tiompkin's score for "Duel in the Sun." This was the first time these forces have recorded for Victor Red Seal almost the whole of a musical background for a motion picture.

"Duel in the Sun" is a Western, featuring Jennifer Jones, Gregory Peck, Joseph Cotten, Lionel Barrymore, Lillian Gish, Walter Huston, Herbert Marshall, Otto Kruger, Tilly Losch and Harry Carey. It has been made by David O. Selznick in technicolor and the budget is said to have reached almost $6,000,000. It will be released in November and at the same time the records made yesterday will be available to the public.

Both the Selznick Studio and RCA Victor decided Arthur Fiedler was the man, and the Pops Orchestra the ensemble to put the Tiompkin score in permanent form. That was for two reasons: First, Mr. Fiedler's skill with modern music, and his popularity with the public. The score arrived in Boston about 10 days ago; Mr. Fiedler studied it and checked for the inevitable errors in every hand-copied new composition.

Sang Into Phone

Mr. Fiedler talked with Dimitri Tiompkin in Hollywood, and the composer, to give the right tempo, sang his tunes into the instrument invented by Alexander Graham Bell. On the Boston end, Mr. Fiedler checked the tempo on a little pocket metronome he carries.

Yesterday morning the Victor apparatus, trunks and trunks of it, was installed at Symphony Hall. Mr. Fieldler was in his rehearsal-conducting uniform of white sweatshirt and gray trousers, and they all were ready to roll.

It was an exhausting day. You can see why very easily. The performance has to be just about perfect, and if anyone coughs or scrapes a chair while the red light is on, bingo!, start again.

They began in the morning. Symphony Hall, stripped of its green Pops decorations and back to its rows of seats and Winter-time red walls, was prepared as for a Boston Symphony rehearsal. The big floor-to-ceiling rehearsal curtain was there, reinforced by another strip of canvas. Microphones were in front of the stage, and a portable loudspeaker, which played back the sides as they were recorded, was on a platform a few feet away from the conductor's stand.

First Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra would rehearse a section, ironing out the last details. Then over another loudspeaker wired from the control room a voice commanded "Stand by!" Then a buzzer buzzed, and in a few seconds the hall took on what Richard Haydn in his "Mr. Carp" sketches used to call "a deathly 'ush." Finally, a red light just in front of Mr. Fiedler was illuminated and it was S second: time to record.

They did each section over two or three times, for the obvious reasons of having more than one copy and of detecting any flaws in the ones they had made first.

Roaring Number

By the time I got there, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra were roaring out a number called "Orizaba," a loud, rhythmic dance tune to which, I am told, Miss Tilly Losch does a sensual dance in the picture. To give you an idea of how loud "Orizaba" is, have a look at some of the instruments: eight horns, five trumpets, five trombones and tuba (1), lots of woodwind, the strings and a whale of a percussion battery that includes bells, gongs, drums, harps, tam-tam, gourds, vibraphone and two marimbas. That's how they do things in Hollywood.

The recording went on until a noontime break for lunch. Then back to work which, except for a late afternoon breather, continued until six.

Let me repeat, that was why there was no Esplanade Concert last night. The whole time I was writing this, the 'phone kept ringing with people asking "How about the Esplanade tonight?" But there will be one tonight, and I mean Friday.

Tanglewood Musicians Heard Weekly in Lenox Churches

LENOX—Some of the world's greatest music may be heard Sundays at the churches in this town.

Lenox congregations are reaping the benefits of the influx of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Tanglewood opera department, and in at least one of the churches, the Congregational Old Church-on-the-Hill, the special music has brought out-of-town worshippers in numbers to boost attendance by about one-third, according to the pastor's estimate.

Jean Bevetti, first violin-cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Julius Theodorowicz, assistant concertmaster and dean of orchestra members, and Victor Polatschek, first clarinetist, are among those who have played at services at the Congregational Church.

The custom of playing at the church originated several years ago when Jean Lafranc, first violist, accepted the invitation of Miss Harriet Parsons, organist. He has returned there annually.

Six of the Tanglewood musicians, including Mr. Bevetti and Felix Folfes, assistant conductor of the opera department under Doris Godolvsky and Leonard Bernstein, are spending the season at the Congregational parsonage with Rev. and Mrs. J. Herbert Owen.

At. St. Ann's Catholic Church, Joseph Ladderoute of the opera department, has sung at mass Sunday for the past four weeks. Others who have sung there are Miss Frances Lehnerts, Miss Nicolette Isaye and Miss Jane Folts.

The Trinity Episcopal Church has augmented its choir with three of the Tanglewood singers for weekly services at Wheatleigh, the Lenox estate of Mrs. Carlos de-Heredia.

BEATING THE COST OF LIVING: The Five-Man Lunch Club [illegible] for a problem that also affects Tanglewood. F. C. Roberts, Gloucester; Arthur Ephross, Roxbury; [illegible] H. Glazer, Dorchester; Robert Nagle, Pittsburgh, Pa.; John R. Ware, Pleasantville, N. J., make their own sandwiches on the grounds at the Berkshire Music Center during the lunch hour.

IE ROVING REPORTER

By Rudolph Elie, Jr.

Pops Goers More Ready to Share Their Fun
Concerts Best Bet to Back Up the Psychologists

If what the psychologists tell us is true—and even if it isn't, it's inter[illegible] having to have 32 or more pleasant reactions a day to make that day count as a good [illegible] you can depend on the Pops to supply the whole batch at one whack if it's necessary. [illegible] all the things to do around town in the evening at this time of year, there's no question[illegible] going to the Pops is tops.

They're not quite the same as they were the last time I went to them, of course. There weren't any uniforms to speak of, the other night, no "Star Spangled Banner" (and I rather missed it, too), no "From the Halls of Montezuma" or "Blue Sky Yonder," no British or French sailors, no crowds of soldiers and sailors waiting in the lobbies, no Red Cross girls or Gray Ladies, no Army or Navy nurses.

But it is no hardship to part with all that. It was thrilling and exciting then, but somehow it always made you feel that your only excuse for being there was to find a moment's relaxation from your own insignificant war work. And the Pops cannot be the Pops if you have to justify yourself being there.

The other night it was as if there had been no war interlude at all. They seem gayer, more informal, more fun than they had ever seemed before. They've been trending that way ever since Arthur Fiedler took over 15 or 16 years ago, and now they seem to have taken on just the proper note of camaraderie without familiarity, friendliness without affectation, fellow-feeling without chumminess, glamour without ostentation. People somehow seem to like people more than they used to, or perhaps it's just that they understand one another better than they used to, or maybe it's just my imagination, but the Pops do seem to bring out the best in people.

Take the way they listen to the music, for instance. It's hard to say why, but somehow Pops-goers instinctively give each piece on the program the sort of hearing suited to the character of the piece. If it's a joke—and this year the biggest joke is "Jingles All the Way," a clever musical parody of radio's singing commercials—then everybody dies laughing. If it's an "Oklahoma" medley, everybody hums. If it's a waltz, everybody lilts a little. If it's The Slaying of the Mosquito, everybody cheers. And if it's one of the more serious things that crops up on one of Mr. Fiedler's wide-ranging program, or a serious young artist making his first flight before so vast an audience, everybody listens respectfully and appreciatively—yet doesn't stuffily shush someone who pops a champagne bottle at the wrong time.

Or take the way people at the Pops look over the latecomers (or rather those who come later than they) as they march down the aisles, their heels making a staccato clatter on the floor. Or the way they examine, with child-like curiosity, the goings-on at a nearby table as others arrive and try to figure out who will sit where. Even these things are done with a certain air at the Pops; the remarks made are rather more funny than mean, more marveling than critical, more commiserating than contemptuous.

Of course it may be merely because the Pops nowadays seldom sell tickets or tables to the general catch-as-catch-can public. Instead, tickets are sold in blocks to schools, charities, business institutions and so on, which, in turn, sell them to friends or well-wishers. Thus an average Pops audience these days consists largely of people or groups of people who, if they don't actually know each other, are at least held loosely together by a bond of mutual interest.

But I like to think it is because the audiences are a little more civilized these days, a little more ready to share their fun with others, a little more ready to recognize that we're all in the same boat together and that we all have the same basic needs and hopes. Also that they're more willing to be tolerant of little thoughtlessnesses in others, and less hasty to condemn a point of view or a taste different from our own. And I like to think that music more than any other agency, is a catalyst for this happy occurrence.

Yet, whatever the reason, there's no denying that the phenomenon of 2500 or so persons sitting around listening to good music, drinking colored ice water or beer, eating ice cream sundaes or pretzels, looking naively at other peoples' hairdos or whatever it is they look at when just looking, and conveying all the time the impression that everybody loves everybody, happens at the Pops as it seldom happens elsewhere.

Of course there's no sense in telling you all this because you'll probably think you'd better rush up and get a ticket or two and see for yourself. And there'd be nothing wrong with that—except that they haven't got any.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL
AUG 11 1946

World of Music

By
Edward P. Halline

THE most exciting music to find its way onto discs in recent months has been American music. No Beethovens have appeared, nor even a Johann Strauss, but proof piles up that the Muse has at last taken root in American soil and is producing some sturdy plants.

Too often these efforts in the past have been tonal wreaths hung upon some laudable cause or name. They have withered rapidly. But some of the more recent American works are likely candidates for immortality—certainly more likely than a lot of mediocre stuff which still persists in the concert hall or opera house repertory.

Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Spring" is one. Elie Siegmeister's "Ozark Set" is another. The former deals with pioneers, as devotees of Martha Graham know. It is as cool and clear as well water. There is even the bitter but stimulating taste of iron. The Siegmeister piece is more obviously folkish and more ingratiating than Copland's work.

Both Copland and Siegmeister come from Brooklyn, but there is no mistaking the touch of Boston hauteur in "Appalachian Spring," especially as performed by the Boston Symphony (Victor M-1046), or the friendly get together of "Ozark Set" in the warmhearted performance by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Minneapolis Symphony (Columbia X-262).

The various movements of the "set," which is another way of saying "suite," are "Morning in the Hills," "Camp Meeting," "Lazy Afternoon" and "Saturday Night."

Nostalgic and gently melodic, "Lazy Afternoon" is comparable to the sweet sighs which escape from passages in Dvorak's "New World" Symphony. The blustering finale makes one wonder if Enesco's gypsies ever got into the Ozarks, for the resemblance between the Siegmeister folk tune and the whirling dance of the "Rumanian Rhapsody" is unmistakable.

Neither "Appalachian Spring" nor "Ozark Set" can be called masterpieces of the first rank. Nonetheless, they are as genuine and authentic in their way as other outpourings of national or racial music, such as Albeniz's "Iberia Suite" or Smetana's symphonic cycle, "My Country."

Likewise, they have none of that synthetic flavor which ruins many a work purporting to be the great American symphony or tone poem.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has long been a champion of American music. His latest recordings are Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Suite" and Randall Thompson's "Testament of Freedom," based on passages from Thomas Jefferson's writings.

Too often the composers write messages instead of music. Not even such a genius as Beethoven could quite put over the gospel of brotherhood in the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony, and only a Handel or Bach have been able to make the flaming poetry of the Bible burn more brightly with music.

SO ANOTHER new American work, Randall Thompson's "Testament of Freedom," is more likely to produce admiration for its sentiments than a complete enslavement of the emotions. It is superbly recorded by the Harvard Glee Club and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky (Victor M-1054). Thompson's setting of some of the more resounding phrases of Thomas Jefferson is always impressive, sometimes eloquently beautiful.

It has the grandeur of a pageant, but the dramatic action is weak. It needs the impact of events, a climactic explosion, to make more of an imprint on the emotions.

That's what you have even in the tremendous length of the "St. Matthew Passion," even in the ritualistic conventions of the Bach B Minor Mass.

GREAT BARRINGTON,
MASS
COURIER
8/1/46

FESTIVAL AND OPERA SINGERS ANNOUNCED

Four Music Center Students to Perform In Closing Symphony

As a result of auditions held last week, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen four singers now studying in the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox to be the soloists in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Ninth Symphony will bring the festival to a close under Dr. Koussecitzky's direction on August 11.

The quartet is to include Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Loderoute, tenor; and James Pease, bass. These singers come from various parts of the country, an indication of the diverse geographical sources of the student body of the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Yeend is from the State of Washington; Miss Alberts from Brookline; Joseph Lederoute from Canada; and James Pease from Indiana.

The cast is also announced for the three performances of "Peter Grimes," the opera which will have its first American production by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood on August 6, 7, and 9. "Peter Grimes" was composed for Tanglewood by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute. The leading soprano part (Ellen) will be sung alternately by Florence Manning and Frances Yeend. Balstrode will be sung by James Pease. The cast will include: Ellen Carleen, Irene Jordan, Frances Lehnerts, Mildred Mueller, Phyllis Smith, Duane Crossley, Paul Franke, Robert Gay, Paul Knowles, Matthew Lockhart, Robert Long, Leonard Treash, and Frederick Zighera.

Eric Crozier, who directed the production at Sadlers Wells in London, and Benjamin Britten, the composer of "Peter Grimes," are both on their way from England to assist in the production here. Richard Rychtarik is the stage designer.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
AUG 1 - 1946

HAWTHORNE COTTAGE PROJECT IS REVIVED

Replica May be Built on Tanglewood Site

The project to build a replica of the Hawthorne cottage on the original site at Tanglewood, Lenox, is soon to be revived, it was disclosed today with the arrival at Tanglewood of Mrs. Guy P. Gannett of Portland, Me., president of the Federated Music clubs of America, which conceived the idea.

The project was disclosed in 1941 but was pigeonholed during the war years. Plans were drawn, however, and Mrs. Gannett expects to consult during the next few days with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to which Tanglewood now belongs, about going ahead with the job. Mrs. Gannett and her husband, publisher of a chain of Maine newspapers, flew in their private plane from Portland to Pittsfield.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
JUL 31 1946

TANGLEWOOD MOVES WRITER OF 'OKLAHOMA'

Would Make Good Background for Musical Production

Oscar Hammerstein, 2d, who wrote such hit shows as "Oklahoma," "The Desert Song" and "Show Boat," thinks Tanglewood, home of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, "would [illegible] background for a musical production. I certainly would like to see it done," he said yesterday before leaving Lenox with Mrs. Hammerstein for their home in Doylestown.

The Hammersteins were in Lenox for the first festival concert series and were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Stefan Lorant at "Merrywood." They hope to return to the Berkshires in time to hear part of the remaining festival concerts.

GREAT BARRINGTON,
MASS
COURIER
8/1/46

Over 25,000 People at Music Festival

The First Three Performances Draw Record Throngs

Dr. Koussevitzky Given Warm Welcome by Audience at Opening Concert.—Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony, in First American Performance Draws Much Applause.

By Harold E. Thompson

Favored by perfect weather, the Berkshire Music Festival was resumed at Tanglewood last Thursday evening and when the first of the series of three concerts, consisting of three performances each, was over Sunday afternoon more than 25,000 music lovers had crowded the music shed and grounds to hear the skillful performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The opening concert on Thursday evening drew an overflow audience, which gave Dr. Koussevitzky a warm welcome as he appeared on the platform. The flawless tone and beautiful phrasing of the famous orchestra was never more in evidence than in the opening number, the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven. It was great music superbly played.

After the intermission the eagerly-awaited Ninth Symphony of Shostakovitch had its first American performance. After the gay allegro opening movement, a reflective moderato movement follows, with beautiful solos for wind instruments. The third movement in three parts played without a break concluded the symphony. It is cleverly scored and of sustained interest throughout. The beautiful playing of the orchestra evoked much applause.

Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," pianoforte pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel, brought the program to a close. Of gorgeous tone coloring and barbaric rhythm this great number is worth going far to hear.

The second concert Saturday evening opened with the famous "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, during which we hear the joyful shepherd's song after the tempest of thunder, lightning and rain, and the birds and brooks.

Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor, with Eugene List as soloist, followed the intermission. Mr. List won great applause by his beautiful playing. At times the fortissimo passages of the piano were a little overbalanced by the orchestra. From the opening arpeggio chords to the triumphant ending of this great composition, Mr. List's playing was of the highest order. He responded to many curtain calls.

The "Daphinis et Chloe" ballet, orchestral excerpts (second suite) by Maurice Ravel finished the concert. With its intriguing harmonies and rhythms and color it evoked great applause.

Another great audience greeted Dr. Koussevitzky Sunday afternoon as the third program opened with Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony in A major, played with great feeling and warmth. Arron Copeland's suite from the ballet "Appalachian Spring" followed and was enthusiastically received by the audience. In the modern style with unusual rhythms and frequent time changes, sometimes one measure after another, it has distinction and interest. Brief piano passages woven in the score accentuate the odd rhythmatic pattern. It is a beautiful composition.

To close the program the orchestra played Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor. Dr. Koussevitzky in a magnificent interpretation of this wonderful score gave the audience the thrill of the afternoon and was widely cheered, applauded and waved at with programs and handkerchiefs at its conclusion.

Brahms Week will open tonight at the Berkshire Festival, when Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of three all-Brahms programs. The second will be given Saturday night at 8:15, and the third, Sunday afternoon at 3:30.

ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD-NEWS
AUG 1 1946

Music Festival Depicted by Octogenarian

By W. G. ROGERS

THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD SCENE OF THE BERKSHIR MUSIC FESTIVALS, by M. A DeWolfe Howe, introduction b Serge Koussevitzky (Vanguard $2).

Tanglewood from Hawthorne t Koussevitzky is the subject of th pretty little book, written by a Bo ton Symphony trustee and Pulitz prize winner in a prose which limpid and sparkling, as indeed ought to be since the author, luckie than most, has had 82 years i which to perfect it.

It was time for a bound record o the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and Music Center, and Howe ha admirably filled the need. He supplements his interestitng story with index, photographs and complete festival programs from the first year 1934, to this, when concerts start July 25.

The change from "Tanglewood Tales" of a century ago to "Tale of Tanglewood" of the present is infinitely greater than the similarity in the titles would suggest. Hawthorne was pure American, and so Lenox area, known to Longfellow, Harriet Beecher Stowe, James Russell Lowell, Emerson and above all, Melville.

Tanglewood today is international. Its music leader was born in Russia, its beautiful Music Shed was built by a Finn. And, according to a hasty check of the last pages of this book, out of 275 compositions played there in 13 years, only 15 or 16 have been by Americans.

For the first program of the series of festival concerts tonig Koussevitzky will present the Symphony, the Tragic Overtur the First Piano Concerto, Claudio Arrau as soloist. Sa night's program will include th ond and Third Symphonies an Rapsody for Contralto, Male C and Orchestra, with Carol Bri soloist. Sunday, Dr. Kous and the orchestra will play th Symphony, Variations on a Th Haydn, and Concerto in A mi violin and violoncelo, with Eric rini and Gregor Piatigorsky, All seats have been sold for weeks for the week-end, but thousands are expected for the ence who will listen to each pr from the lawn, as they did fo first series.

Events at the Berkshire Center, open to members of th ciety of Friends of the school, a symphony concert tomorrow at 8:15 by the advanced stude chestra; a choral concert Sa afternoon at 2:30 at Trinity c Lenox; a chamber music concer day morning at 10:30, and thr formances of the Western phere premiere of the opera, Grimes," by the British co Benjamin Britten, next Tu Wednesday and Friday evening

The final festival series wi Thursday evening, August 18, Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5, mann's Violoncello Concerto i nor, Wagner's Prelude to "Lohe and Strauss' "Till Eugensp Merry Pranks," rondo. Pia will again be the soloist.

LITCHFIE
ENQUIRER
8/1/46

REPORTER
8/1/46

The B
Music

The Berkshire
Stockbridge, Ma
a cherished Ame nine years ago, in vitsky has tried, establish a Music in the Berkshire
those in Salzberg.
Koussevitzky has through the first shed was barely fi performance had thunder storm, and cult war years whe postponed for a y o continue with a ram in the smalle
This year, the fi val held in a
he Boston Sympho
he big, open Mus
enting a magnif rogram. The shed
he Berkshire Mour
,500 people with m n the surrounding ounds rich and hed and mingles
esh country air.
It was thrilling
ay evening at the ce and rememb ight nine years
as a flimsy ructure and rced to stop the
the thunder,
r funds to finish
y evening was d the nbelievable
The openi oven's 3rd S e premier in itch's ninth and orgsky's "Picture he "Eroica," a hony which Bee ortrait of Napoleo
uch more conten
endous compositi as a wonderful hich characteriz ork and which ronounced and hird. Dr. Koussev on Symphony pe
a" with all the requires. Especial the 2nd and 3rd
Funeral March death, was played heaviness without overburdened beautiful Scherzo ness we expect body that runs th phony. The finale
o a fine,
The third or the series pening. It seemed nd determination
Music Center.

[227]

LITCHFIELD, CONN
ENQUIRER
8/1/46

BURY, CONN
REPORTER
8/1/46

The Berkshire Music Festival

by Esther Bufferd

The Berkshire Music Festival at Stockbridge, Mass., has fast become a cherished American tradition. Begun nine years ago, in 1937, Serge Koussevitsky has tried, and succeeded, to establish a Music Center and Festival in the Berkshires patterned after those in Salzberg, Switzerland. Dr. Koussevitzky has seen the center through the first years when the big shed was barely finished and the first performance had to compete with a thunder storm, and through the difficult war years when the Festival was postponed for a year, but struggled to continue with a Bach-Mozart program in the smaller shed.

This year, the first year of the Festival held in a peaceful world, sees the Boston Symphony again housed in the big, open Music Shed and presenting a magnificent three weeks program. The shed, situated high in the Berkshire Mountains, houses about 6,500 people with many more relaxing on the surrounding lawns. The music sounds rich and true as it fills the shed and mingles with the night and fresh country air.

It was thrilling to sit there Thursday evening at the opening performance and remember the miserable night nine years ago when the shed was a flimsy, unfinished wooden structure and Dr. Koussevitsky was forced to stop the symphony because of the thunder, and made an appeal for funds to finish the building. Thursday evening was perfect though cool, and the music was enhanced by an unbelievable raspberry-colored sunset.

The opening program included Beethoven's 3rd Symphony, the "Eroica," the premier in America of Shostakovitch's ninth and excerpts from Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The "Eroica," a majestic, heroic symphony which Beethoven wrote as a portrait of Napoleon but which seems much more contemporary, is a tremendous composition. The symphony has a wonderful free, lusty quality which characterizes all of Beethoven's work and which seems especially pronounced and wonderful in the third. Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony performed the "Eroica" with all the vitality and vigor it requires. Especially beautiful were the 2nd and 3rd movements. The Funeral March, completely void of death, was played with quietness and heaviness without making it seem overburdened or too tense. The light, beautiful Scherzo had the delicateness we expect and yet achieved the body that runs throughout the symphony. The finale brings the "Eroica" to a fine, smashing Beethoven finish. The third was a wonderful opening for the series and for Thursday night's opening. It seemed to voice the hopes and determination desired for the Music Center.

The premier performance of the modern Russian composer, Shostakovitch's ninth, was a big surprise though not a disappointment. Completely different from the composer's seventh and eighth symphonies, which are heavy and confused with the catastrophies of war, this one is light and gay and sustained. What is most amazing is its purity and simplicity—the classic quality he achieves in the first movement. It is a delicate thing, though there are moments, especially in the second and fourth movements, where there is tension and a wonderful, deep undercurrent. The basson solo in the Largo is very beautiful and unusual. Throughout the symphony there are original, pleasing harmonies and rhythms which make the ninth symphony Shostakovitch's own. The last movement is full with mirth and the melody of victory and joyous. This is almost the only movement which reminds one of his earlier works and their loud fullness. The finale leaves one with a happy feeling and a smile on one's face.

The concert ended with Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." This is especially lovely as it is quite well known and a very satisfactory piece of music. At times delicate and humorous, at times powerful and melodious, the composition brings the concert to a happy closing.

The three compositions in all made the evening a well-rounded, perfect one. And, of course, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony leaves nothing to be desired.

Impressions of Koussevitzky at the Bach-Mozart Concerts

It is really a privilege to have to sit on the stage behind the orchestra at a Bach-Mozart Festival in Tanglewood. For a few moments the humble concertgoer can pretend he is part of the orchestra. The intimate view he obtains on crossing the footlights is as surprising as the change when Alice went through the looking-glass. There is so much that one just doesn't see out front. First and foremost there is the priceless opportunity to study a great conductor at close range. Don't think for a moment the conductor just stands there and beats time with a big stick. The baton, for one thing, is no more than a wisp, a sort of lemonade straw, which he may use occasionally to indicate tempo, but most of the time, as the gentleman beside me observed, Koussevitzky conducts with his eyebrows. Such a gorgeously expressive face! If ever he were to desert the concert stage (perish the thought!) he could easily land a job in the movies! With a look he coaxes, entreats, fairly pulls the players into a crescendo; then with the lightest gesture dissolves the wave of sound, as instantaneously as the kettle-drummer's fingers stop the vibration of his instruments. At the beginning of the lovely Andante in the G-minor symphony, Koussevitzky's eyes are closed, his face lifted in prayerful attitude. He makes it clear that he wants only the merest whisper from the violins, and he gets it. When the tempo grows livelier he pops his lips and begins to hum the tune. In the gay allegro he smiles, waves his hands gently, apparently enjoying the rhythm. At a louder, more resolute passage, he sticks out his chin like Mussolini. When they play the rollicking minuet from the E-flat symphony his face broadens into what can only be called a smirk. Hardly less expressive than his face are his hands — now lovingly rounding a tone, drawing it out fine, now pointing in quick summons to a single voice, now gently dismissing it. So sensitively does he mirror every delicate line and shading in Mozart's fastidiously perfect music, I think even one without ears could follow it by watching Koussevitzky.

—Alice V. Brown.

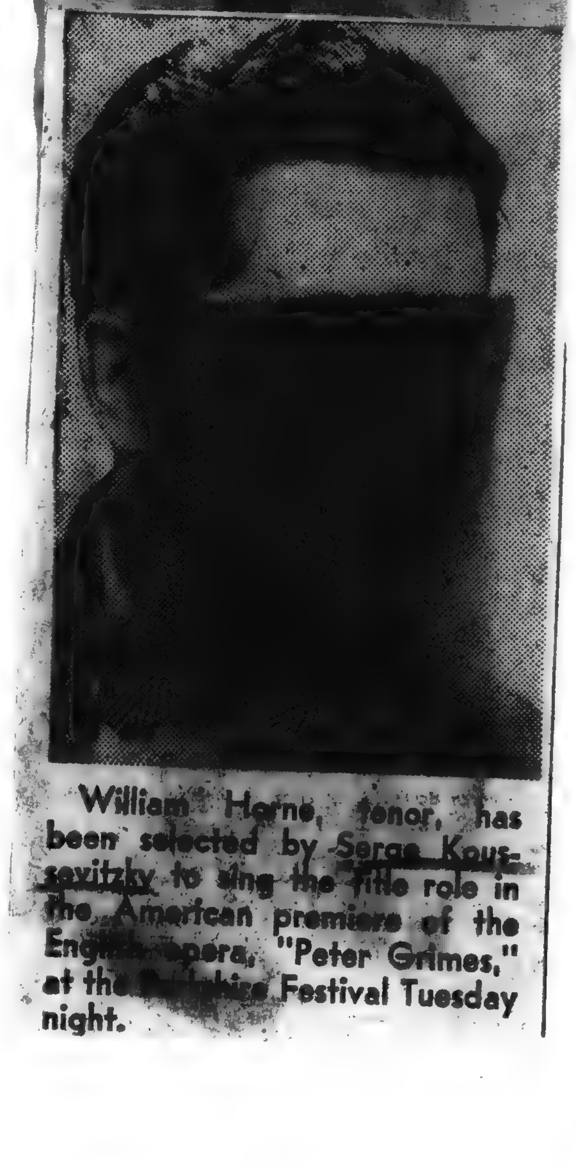
Tanglewood Porch, an old woodcut reproduced in The Tale of Tanglewood, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, published by Vanguard.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM



William Horne, tenor, has been selected by Serge Koussevitzky to sing the title role in the American premiere of the English opera, "Peter Grimes," at the Berkshire Festival Tuesday night.

ARDMORE, PA
TIMES
8/1/46

Bryn Mawr Students Admitted to Festival

Three students from Bryn Mawr are listed among the 400 accepted for admission to this Summer's study and concert sessions of the Berkshire Music Center in Massachusetts.

Besides having a chance to hear concerts by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the students themselves will perform during the festival.

The three from Bryn Mawr are Corna Cooke deVaron of College Inn, Nancy Sapp and Genevieve D. Winston, both of the Mermont.

MILLERTON, N.Y
NEWS
8/1/46

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Brahms Week Opens Tonight At Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky To Direct Second Series Of Festival Concerts

Brahms Week will open at the Berkshire Festival tonight at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three all-Brahms programs tonight and Saturday night at 8:1[illegible] and Sunday afternoon at 2:30.

For the opening program of the second series of festival concerts Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen the Fourth Symphony, the Tragic Overture and the First Piano Concerto, with Claudio Arrau as soloist. Saturday night's program includes the Second and Third Symphonies and the Rapsody for Contralto, Male Chorus and Orchestra with Carol Brice as soloist. Sunday's program, the First Symphony, Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Concerto in A minor for Violin and Violoncello, with Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky, soloists.

Seats remain for tonight's concert, but Saturday and Sunday's program have been sold out for several weeks. Several thousands are expected for the audience outside the shed.

Events at the Berkshire Music Center, open to members of Society of Friends of the school, include three performances of the opera, "Peter Grimes," to be given its first American presentation, on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday; a concert by the advanced orchestra of the school, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky's students tomorrow evening; a choral program Saturday afternoon at 2:30 and a chamber music concert Sunday morning at 10:30.

For the next two Saturday mornings at 10 the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky will give a public rehearsal for the benefit of the pension fund at a nominal fee.

GREAT BARRINGTON,
MASS
COURIER
8/1/46

Interest in Music

That there is more than a minor interest in music in Southern Berkshire has been shown in the past and is being shown at present. The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in years past always attracted its full share of patrons from our own towns and villages.

Recently we had an opportunity to show whether we were willing to go to some trouble to bring music here as well as to patronize it when it came to us voluntarily. This was when subscriptions were being sought for a series of three fall and spring concerts, to be brought here by the Community Concert Association of Great Barrington. The response was more than many of the volunteer workers had hoped for and as a result the association was able to announce last week the names of the artists who will perform here. In their fields, the Bartlett and Robertson piano duo; Donald Dame, Metropolitan Opera tenor; and the Trapp family of singers are among the best.

Just last week the field of band music was opened to Southern Berkshire when the local American Legion band gave its first concert on the town hall lawn. [illegible] music of an entirely different [illegible] available and the several [illegible] attended the first performance enjoyed it very much. These concerts come under the heading of providing our own music and the director and members of the band deserve our thanks for the time they have given to becoming a smoothly functioning unit.

GREAT BARRINGTON,
MASS
COURIER
8/1/46

FESTIVAL AND OPERA SINGERS ANNOUNCED

Four Music Center Students to Perform In Closing Symphony

As a result of auditions held last week, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen four singers now studying in the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox to be the soloists in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Ninth Symphony will bring the festival to a close under Dr. Koussecitzky's direction on August 11.

The quartet is to include Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Loderoute, tenor; and James Pease, bass. These singers come from various parts of the country, an indication of the diverse geographical sources of the student body of the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Yeend is from the State of Washington; Miss Alberts from Brookline; Joseph Lederoute from Canada; and James Pease from Indiana.

The cast is also announced for the three performances of "Peter Grimes," the opera which will have its first American production by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood on August 6, 7, and 9. "Peter Grimes" was composed for Tanglewood by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute. The leading soprano part (Ellen) will be sung alternately by Florence Manning and Frances Yeend. Balstrode will be [illegible] James Pease. The cast will [illegible] Ellen Carleen, Irene Jordan, [illegible] Lehmerts, Mildred Mueller, [illegible] Smith, Duane Crossley, Paul [illegible], Robert Gay, Paul Knowles, Matthew Lockhart, Robert Long, Leonard Treash, and Frederick Zighera.

Eric Crozier, who directed the production at Sadlers Wells in London, and Benjamin Britten, the composer of "Peter Grimes," are both on their way from England to assist in the production here. Richard Rychtarik is the stage designer.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS-POST
AUG [illegible]

Select Artists For Festival Closing

Serge Koussevitzky has chosen four singers now studying in the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., to be the soloists in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Berkshire Festival.

The Ninth Symphony will bring the Festival, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, to a close on August 11.

FOUR LISTED

The quartet is to include Frances Yeend, sporano; Euince Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor; James Pease, bass.

These singers come from various parts of the country, an indication of the diverse geographical sources of the student body of the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Yeend is from the State of Washington; Miss Alberts from Brookline, Mass.; Mr. Laderoute from Canada; Mr. Pease from Indiana.

AMERICAN PREMIERE

It is also announced that the opera, "Peter Grimes," will be presented for the first time in America by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood on August 6, 7, 9. "Peter Grimes" was composed for Tanglewood by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation.

Eric Crozier, who directed the production at Sadlers Wells in London, and Benjamin Britten, the composer of "Peter Grimes," are both on their way from England to assist in the production here. Richard Rychtarik is the stage designer.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

Tanglewood Concert Heard by Thousands

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Aug. 1.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, and assisted by Claudio Arrau, pianist, opened the second of three series of concerts tonight at Tanglewood before a capacity shed audience of six thousand, and several hundred more who braved the inclement weather and sought shelter wherever they could in surrounding areas.

These three concerts are comprised entirely of the music of Brahms. This is hardly a surprising choice because of its striking contrast to the music of Bach and Mozart of the past two seasons.

'Festival' Idea Held

The "festival" idea is retained, but Brahms allows a tremendously enlarged sphere of musical activity as befits a recovery from wartime restrictions of auditorium and decreased orchestra.

We have frequently acclaimed Koussevitzky's interpretations of classic works, with special praise for his treatment of Haydn. We have written with equal enthusiasm of this orchestra's penchant for the fireworks and impassioned phrases of Tschaikowsky.

Inspired Concerts

This weekend will reveal the orchestra and conductor's perceptions and emulations of the virile, sturdy, insistent, and sometimes obscured pages of Johannes Brahms. There are many who accept the music of the German master with reservations. They are not entirely without justification.

If they are students of his music, they are frequently aware of his shortcomings. If they seek the obvious in musical elements, they are confused.

But the final analysis, made so admirably possible by these three concerts of choice Brahms repertory, will undoubtedly reveal to the most convinced skeptic, a depth of expression and an inspiration that diminish stylistic differences to the rank of detail.

Music Criticized

With all respect to Koussevitzky as program builder, I question the wisdom of opening this series with the "Tragic Overture, Opus 81."

I am not alluding to preference for its companion, the "Academic Festival Overture." The themes of the "Tragic Overture" (the title, by the way, is a misnomer) have, in turn, grace and nobility. But in many instances they shriek in [illegible] importance, and much of the more poetic excerpts lag and even drag.

The work was given an irreproachable performance, and my arguments to it as this series' curtain raiser are purely with the music itself.

Technical Skill Screened

The impression that Claudio Arrau made in Worcester in a 1944 civic music concert was that of technician par excellence, as well as enlightened interpreter. Tonight, he played the "Piano Concerto in D Minor, Opus 15," which means that his technical skill was frequently screened from hearing by the orchestra, and extravagant demands were made on his musicianship.

Arrau re-enacted the pianism he demonstrated at his Worcester appearance. His technique, particularly in the fiendishly difficult passages of the first movement were precise. His rhythmic sense was unflinching, and the more poetic fragments were played, for the most part, with rich, singing tone.

Evidences of Nervousness

On the other hand, there were evidences of nervousness in the pianist that inspired a lack of confidence and mannerisms that tended to magnify pianistic difficulties at the expense of musical result.

Nevertheless, the gloomy first movement was not permitted to evolve into moroseness, and the "Adagio" was a panorama of rich tonal color. The final movement did not disappoint either in technical or dramatic brilliance.

The post-intermission program and our "deadline" did not coordinate, so we must postpone to a later date our discussion of the "Symphony in E Minor, No. 4, Opus 98."

Saturday night's concert will have Carol Brice for contralto soloist in the "Rhapsody, Opus 53."

The Sunday afternoon concert will include the infrequently-heard "Concerto for Violin and 'Cello, Opus 102," with Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky as

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
AUG 2 - 1946

Music

Arrau Is Star in Berkshires

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 2.—Gentle, pattering rain mingled with the music of Brahms last night, as the second week of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival got under way. The week is to be all-Brahms, anyway, and the initial program offered the noted Chilean pianist Claudio Arrau, as soloist in the D minor concerto. Proceedings opened with the justly famous "Tragic" overture, and closed with the Fourth Symphony.

Such a technically fastidious and sensuous performance as Mr. Arrau furnished to his numerous listeners is not a usual thing. There was grandeur to his playing and a nobility of purpose that are all but forgotten these days.

The wealth of color and nuance in the slow movement, for instance, were a textbook in themselves on the romantic adagio. He paced the section so that the arpeggio passage toward the close came as a most exciting contrast. It took careful timing and the ever-present awareness of line to project all that, and besides, there was a beautiful and lyrical freshness to the whole movement, whose achievement depended entirely on the remarkable rapport and balance between orchestra and soloist.

Interpretation.

Mr. Arrau's very clean, very precise and rhythmically secure work in the faster parts of the concerto aided matters, of course. However, we are used to such things from him. It was in the inner, almost mystical and secret reflections of Brahms that he proved the more brilliant prophet and interpreter.

Maggie Teyte, England's foremost prima donna, will make her Stadium Concerts debut next Thursday night on a joint program with Ezio Pinza. Miss Teyte will sing a group of well-known French and English songs.

It is almost alarming to think that once a noted critic dismissed this concerto as being "born to the grave." Of course, now we know its longevity and its promise to last, perhaps, as long as music does. A music reviewer becomes alarmed at declarations like the above, because he makes many of his own.

So easy it is to consign some new composition to the oblivion of silence and thus be wrong, and so difficult to predict in the bold manner a great future for another such and be right. But, as history always proves, words are as ephemeral as the seconds that tick away and, in the final analysis, there is music, which—for better or worse—makes its own part in time.

Rain and Brahms.

The rain and Brahms—together. The rain is sweet, kind, almost apologetically continuing its steady patter all through the Fourth Symphony. But in the music there is a sense of the starkness of fate. It seems appropriate for this symphony to have a connection of sorts with the tragedies of Sophocles. When Brahms wrote this he was deeply immersed in the plays of the Greek dramatist. If music can talk, then surely this creation must be saying something in the spirit of those ancient classics. At any rate, it pleases us to think so.

Serge Koussevitzky and his redoubtable Bostonians have done themselves credit this night with the superior quality of their performances. So be it, and there be lots more of it.

[illegible] TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
AUG 2 - 1946

Boston Symphony Presents First in All-Brahms Series

Cold Rain Cuts Festival Audience at Tanglewood to About 7,000, Principally Seat-Holders—Claudio Arrau, Chilean Pianist, Warmly Received for His Performance of First Piano Concerto—More Brahms Offerings Tomorrow Evening, Sunday Afternoon—All Reservations Taken for Both Concerts.

The second series of Berkshire Symphonic festival concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky opened last evening at Tanglewood, Lenox, when the first of three all-Brahms programs was performed before an audience of approximately 7,000, with Claudio Arrau, Chilean pianist, as assisting artist.

Cold rain which pattered too lightly on the immense roof of the vast music shed to interfere with enjoyment of the music, dripped persistently enough from trees and shrubs and from the clouds that almost rested on their crests to discourage an attendance equal to the crowds of last week-end. Those who stayed away were the general admission customers who, on mild, fair evenings and bright summer Sunday afternoons, enjoy the concert from Tanglewood lawns outside the big shed, feeling no envy at all for those within who have spent for the privilege of occupying a box or a steel chair. Box-holders and seat purchasers were not discouraged, however, and there were very few vacancies indeed. The relatively few who bought general admission tickets crowded in under the music shed portico for shelter from the rain and the chill wind that played across the Tanglewood acres.

The size of the audience did not seem to make much difference in the enthusiasm with which the program was received. Some think Brahms does not evoke so spontaneous a response as do the works of more emotional composers. But Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Arrau and the orchestra could not complain that their efforts last night were coldly received. The conductor was called back to the podium again and again at the close of the concert despite the usual rush to the parking lots by those who thought they could beat the traffic jams with an early start. Mr. Arrau took no less than six bows when he and the orchestra had concluded the Brahms First piano concerto to which they gave a brilliant performance.

The Tragic overture, which opened the concert, and the Fourth symphony, in E minor, were the other offerings of the evening.

All-Brahms programs will also be given on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon. On Saturday evening the Third and Second symphonies, in F major and D major, respectively, will be performed by the orchestra, and Carol Brice and a Berkshire Music Center chorus trained by Robert Shaw will join with the orchestra to give the Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra (Opus 53). The Rhapsody and the Second symphony will be broadcast from 9:30 to 10:30 o'clock by the ABC nation-wide network. The Sunday afternoon program will consist of the Variations on a Theme Haydn (Opus 56a), the Concerto in A minor for violin and violincello with orchestra, in which Erica Morini, violinist, and Gregor Piatigorsky, violincellist, will be the soloists, and the First symphony, in C minor.

All seats for both the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts have been sold for some time, according to Festival officials, but if the weather is fair they expect huge audiences on the lawns to supplement the 6,000 or more reservation-holders.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
AUG 2 - 1946

BRAHMS HEARD AT TANGLEWOOD

Arrau, Chilean Pianist, Plays D Minor Concerto.

By IRVING KOLODIN.
Special to The New York Sun.

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 2.—In the lexicon of Serge Koussevitzky, Shakespeare's "Sweets to the Sweet" reads "Brahms to the Brahmins" (Bostonian and otherwise). For the second week of the Berkshire festival, which began at Tanglewood last night, he has prepared a series of Brahms programs which will include all of the four symphonies, two concertos and various other works.

The patter of rain which began at nightfall and continued intermittently through the concert was an inconvenience only as it would have been anywhere—in the walk from transportation to shelter. For the ample music shed swallowed up not only those who had bought out all the available seats, but also those whose general admission tickets provided for standing or leaning room where it could be found. More than a few hardy nature-and-music-lovers curled up under nearby trees, and heard the music and the rain at the same time.

Actually this proved, on inspection, to be the best place to hear Claudio Arrau, the Chilean pianist, play the D minor concerto. This has always seemed a work too stormy and thick-sounding for an ordinary concert hall; and when one substituted, for the leavening tone controls of a phonograph or radio, retirement to an appropriate distance from the point of conflict between piano and orchestra, the quality of sound attained a balance it rarely has indoors.

Between them, soloist and conductor provided a performance of the work which was full of intellectual as well as physical vigor, unhampered by any need for sidestepping the pitfalls with which the work is sprinkled. Arrau cleared all the technical hurdles of his past without breaking stride, and with a degree of reserve power for the most formidable which won a new respect for his abilities, already rated as considerable. It was altogether a firm, free-flowing performance which merited the hearty applause that it received.

The orchestral works of the program were the "tragic" overture of the Fourth Symphony, which made for an evening of close to the best Brahms. One may be sure that the orchestral musicians were hardly as comfortable on this damp evening as the listeners were, but the evidences in the playing were few indeed.

NEWPORT, ARK
INDEPENDENT
8/2/46

NEW OPERA COMING

Stockbridge, Mass. — The first American performance of the new opera "Peter Grimes" will be held at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood Aug. 6.

Written by Benjamin Briton of London, the opera was chosen to reopen the Sadler Wells Opera after the war. Eric Crozier, who directed the world premier in London, will stage the opera here.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

AUG 2 - 1946

Rhythm and Reason

Music at Tanglewood Undampened by Rainy Weather

By Harriett Johnson

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 2—The forces of nature are greater than the forces of man but last night's concert at the Berkshire Festival broke the rule with a gusto. The dripping skies became inconsequential in their perversity. As the music proceeded, even the rain tamed down to expressing itself through an intermittent drizzle completely unimportant as compared with the power of Brahms, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plus Claudio Arrau, Chilean pianist, who performed the D Minor Concerto.

This second series in the festival program is dedicating itself exclusively to the music of Brahms, including performances of all four symphonies, the alto rhapsody, the double concerto for violin and cello. Last night's opening concert, besides the piano concerto, scheduled the tragic overture, Opus 81, and the Fourth Symphony in E minor.

Listeners With Blankets

It took a little courage at the outset, in spite of the beauty of the surroundings, not to be depressed by the conspicuous absence of the sun and a penetrating dampness. Over 7,000 enthusiasts, however, turned up their noses at the elements; they brought fur coats, blankets, shawls and sweaters. They sat on seats or on the ground, and were rewarded by experiencing a concert which proved the perfect combination of great music performed with great inspiration.

Maestro Koussevitzky, wearing a tuxedo rather than his more formal Carnegie Hall tails, was, as in former years at the festival, more relaxed than in his winter conducting. The orchestra, properly sympathetic to his mood, sounded in both the symphony and the concerto brilliant but lacking in tenseness. The result was a consistent beauty of tone with a superconception and realization of dynamic variation. What was loud was just the amount of sound the maestro intended and the same held for the gradations all along the line. And this was accomplished without any driving quality to mar the spontaneous flow of the music.

Arrau Thoughtful in Tone

Mr. Arrau's playing of the concerto had an intense quality of concentration which is probably better suited to the great work he played than any other he might have chosen. This music is not for display in the ordinary sense and, although grateful to the instrument, is reflective. It needs brilliance and probing depth of feeling for proper re-creation.

The lines of melody Arrau played gave the impression an actor might who, intent on the beauty he was expressing, became lost in his own thoughts. In losing himself, however, he found a rare beauty for his listeners and it was obvious the audience knew they were hearing no ordinary performance. Both pianist and conductor got an ovation and returned numerous times to receive the prolonged applause of the crowd.

Driving over to the festival, our philosophical taxi driver remarked, apropos of the weather, that we shouldn't be surprised at anything that might happen in the Berkshires. Well, anything can happen to the weather, but what did happen musically last night in the shed, although not surprising, will long be remembered by a host of listeners, chilly in their bones but who went away with warmed hearts.

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR

AUG 2 - 1946

Berkshire Festival Singers Announced

Vacationists from this Vicinity, who will be in eastern Massachusetts during the next two weeks, plan to hear the music festival at Tanglewood in Lenox where Serge Koussevitsky is the conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestar's presentation of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on Aug. 11 will have as soloists: Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

The cast has also been announced for the three performances of "Peter Grimes," the opera which will have its first American production at Tanglewood on Aug. 6, [illegible] 9. "Peter Grimes" was composed for Tanglewood by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute. The leading soprano part will be sung alternately by Florence Manning and Frances Yeend. Balstrode will be sung by James Pease.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

AUG 2 - 1946

ARRAU SOLOIST IN NEW SERIES

Tanglewood Weather Cold, Audience Warm

By Willard M. Clark

LENOX, Aug. 2—Cold, unpleasant weather greeted the thousands who thronged Tanglewood last night to usher in the second series of the Berkshire festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under t[illegible] Serge Koussevitsky.

This series of three concerts will be devoted to the works of Johannes Brahms. Soloists to be heard include the pianist Claudio Arrau, who played the first piano concerto last night; the Negro contralto, Carol Brice, who appears Saturday night in the "Rhapsody for Contralto and Male Chorus"; and Erica Morini, violinist and Gregory Piatigorsky, the cellist, who will be heard in the double concerto for violoncello and orchestra Sunday afternoon.

Take the conducting genius of a Koussevitsky, add to it the virtuosi who make up the Boston Symphony Orchestra; give them the music of Johannes Brahms to play and you have an unbeatable combination. At least that is what the huge audience seemed to think last night. There was tremendous applause following every number and a veritable ovation for Claudio Arrau following his stirring p[illegible]

The dark, [illegible]oding music which made up the majority of the program seemed in tune with the weather. From the opening crashing chords of the "Tragic Overture" to the herculean finale of the fourth symphony there was a continuous surge of mighty music, towering to the skies, with only passages of nostalgic beauties to relieve them.

Mr. Arrau is a fine pianist. His playing glitters cool and suave. It would have taken a Lhevine to cope with the tremendous crescendi built up by the orchestra. It was in the cadenzas that the pianist had ample opportunity to be communicative. His reading was deeply felt and magnificently given. Particularly effective was the performance of the second movement, rich in lyrical beauty, plaintive, yet alive with an underlying strength, barely leashed. In the variations of the finale, pianist and orchestra joined in a performance so exciting that it elicited cheers. Soloist and conductor were recalled again and again.

The concert concluded with a memorable performance of the "Symphony No. 4 in E Minor." In this the master's last symphonic work, misses these certain bright and engaging qualities which one finds in the second and third symphonies. Instead, one listens to somber [illegible] and to massive and stately [illegible].

There was a nobility and sweep to the performance which completely captivated the audience. It was a typical Koussevitsky reading, a stupendous achievement by the orchestra.

The program Saturday night will include beside the "Rhapsody for Contralto, Male Chorus and Orchestra," the second and third symphonies.

BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS

AUG 2 - 1946

Among Us Girls

By LYDIA

As we sat in the great music shed at Tanglewood on a recent perfect Sunday afternoon, the thought occurred that some avid witchhunting committee might well classify the performance under the heading of "Un-American Activities." The 15,000 people present were listening with rapt attention to a Russian conductor, and the symphony of the moment was the work of a Russian composer.

* * *

It isn't the fashion now to be nice about the Russians, let alone pretend to understand them, but it must be admitted that out of Russia has come some of the world's greatest music. And it doesn't make us a Communist to say that nobody can interpret that music like Mr. Koussevitsky.

* * *

If there were only a political Mr. K. to interpret some of the Russian moves in the international field, things might go better with the poor struggling U. N.!

* * *

As we looked up at the curved arch of the shed roof, with its iron supports criss-crossed back and forth, we marvelled that so stark a structure should have such wonderful accoustics. Perhaps therein lies the answer. Open on three sides, the breezes blow through in gemutlich fashion, and we'll take the results to the most modern of air-conditioning effects.

* * *

The audience at Tanglewood was in itself a remarkable thing; not an asthmatic wheeze, let alone a bored cough, was emitted during the whole afternoon. Perhaps it was the beneficial air of them thar Berkshire Hills, but more than likely it was merely proof of the old saying that "music hath charms"...... yes, even Russian music!

* * *

The people that attend the concerts are a cosmopolitan cross-cut, much more so, for example than that which one sees at a ball game. This gives strength to the belief that love of music is universal, and by the age of many of the subscribers also indicates that love of music outlives many other loves.

* * *

One could find, no doubt, a car from almost every state in the union among the thousands in the parking lots, for the festival is a mecca to which devotees come from great distances.

* * *

Among those who seem to be having as good a time as any, were the large number who had no seats, but used the great lawns of the estate for this purpose. They brought their own blankets or their own folding chairs, and if they arrived early, they enjoyed leisurely picnics until the big moment for the opening number arrived.

* * *

In the front row sat one of the great patrons of music in this country, Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. The suite from the ballet, "Appalachian Spring," by the American composer Aaron Copland, was dedicated to her so that she had more than usual interest in the afternoon's program. We had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Coolidge, a massive woman in her eighties, who didn't look to be an octogenarian. Her handicap of deafness was not concealed, and a hearing device reposed on her chest, but apparently she is one of those fortunate souls who can feel music and her knowledge is great enough so that she can watch the musicians at work with as much pleasure as others get listening.

Part of the enjoyment of a Berkshire festival for us is that ancillary portion, involving the trip to Lenox via the New Boston route, along the west branch of the Farmington River. The lack of traffic was surprising enough, and eating our sandwiches and salad on the river bank was almost as peaceful as in a spot on a country by-way. And no curious cows were on hand to discomfit us with their sad brown-eyed gazing.

* * *

The Berkshire Festival was one of those things that was called off as a result of Pearl Harbor, and the resultant gasoline rationing. Its revival is one of the good things that has returned with what might laughingly be called "the peace", if it were not so sad a thing.

* * *

"The Show Shop" in Canton, too, has returned, another good event, for those who like the theatre, and find the Show Shop performances as refreshing as a cool drink on a summer's eve. The Cobleighs were in good form in "The Barker" and the audience obviously had a pleasantly relaxed time without cerebral effort.

* * *

Wandering under the clear night sky during the intermission, and sipping an unsophisticated drink called "Squirt", we decided that the world has its good moments, in spite of the mess that is sometimes made of it by man.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 2 - 1946

Brahms Week End Opens At Berkshire Festival

Arrau Is Piano Soloist With Boston Symphony

Special to the Herald Tribune

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 1.—A week end of Brahms opened tonight at Tanglewood with the first of a series of three concerts in the Berkshire Music Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted, with Claudio Arrau as soloist in the Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor.

Mr. Arrau was born in Chile and gave his first recital at five in Santiago. While a student, Mr. Arrau won the Liszt and Bach prizes. Since a recital at Carnegie Hall in 1941, he has averaged 100 appearances a year.

The other two numbers on tonight's program were the Tragic Overture, Op. 81, and Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98, with Mr. Arrau as soloist.

Showers kept down tonight's audience to the 6,500 capacity of the music shed.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 2 - 1946

Berkshire Symphonic Festival Opens Its All Brahms Series

Boston Orchestra Plays 'Tragic' Overture and Fourth Symphony; Claudio Arru Concerto Soloist

By JOHN D. DONOGHUE

Lenox, Aug. 2—For many of the "there is no good in Brahms" school this is the longest of the three weeks of the Berkshire Music festival, but for the 7000 Brahms' lovers who filled the Tanglewood shed last night, the first of the three all Brahms programs was sheer delight.

The Boston orchestra under Dr Serge Koussevitzky was in its usual fine form for the Fourth symphony and the "Tragic" overture, and Claudio Arrau, the Chilean pianist, proved himself master of one of the most demanding of all concertos, the first.

The first rain of the current season might have dampened the clothes of the audience; it did not dampen its spirits. Despite the chill outside, there was a heartfelt welcome for the soloist, the conductor and the orchestra.

Less frequently programmed than his "Academic" overture, the "Tragic" overture was a fine choice to open the Brahms week and the conductor played its contrasting themes dramatically.

In the concerto, Mr Arrau addressed himself more to the music than to the audience, largely letting the matter of balance up to the conductor. Never once did he strain for a big tone. The result was always good for the composer, but not always good for the soloist who occasionally was overpowered by the orchestra. In the first movement, especially, where the main theme is written in ungrateful fashion, it is hard for any soloist to let the piano sing that others besides the performers may enjoy it. As it was, Arrau received as hearty applause from the orchestra as any soloist this reviewer has seen. It was a musician's triumph. The tender Adagio was given with lovely tone, while the finale found the pianist tossing off his portion with ease and affection.

As for the Fourth, it is conceded one of the greatest, and it will not be easy to forget that final movement where the rondo-or is it a chaconne?—is one of the greatest music writing feats in history. The handling of the variations was memorable.

Saturday night at 8.15, the second and third symphonies are scheduled, plus the Alto rhapsody, Carol Brice soloist.

LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD

2 - 1946

Julius Katchen Given Honors

Julius Katchen, son of Mr. and Mrs. Ira J. Katchen of Long Branch, has been notified that he has been awarded the graduate scholarship to represent Haverford College as a graduate exchange fellow for a year's study at the University of Paris.

JULIUS KATCHEN

Thies award is the result of the scholarship record of Mr. Katchen who was graduated this year from Haverford College with honors and elected to Phi Beta Kappa.

Julius waes a graduate of Long Branch High School in 1943 and is a well known cotncert pianist. He is at present pianist for the Berkshire Music Center under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, where he recently performed the "Beethoven Emperor Concerto" before an enthusiastic audience of several thousand.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

1946

New Opera Coming

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass. (U.P.)—The first American performance of the new opera "Peter Grimes" will be held at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Aug. 6.

Written by Benjamin Briton of London, the opera was chosen to reopen the Sadler Wells Opera after the war. Eric Crozier, who directed the world premier in London, will stage the opera here.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 2 - 1946

THE MUSIC BOX

By JOHN D. DONOGHUE

This week, so far as our very personal pleasure was concerned the principal music news was Tanglewood, though there were some fir new Columbia recordings to brighten the nights and the days to com To balance that good news is a note from Madame Cora Claiborne sayin that she's going to teach voice in New York.

That's good news for the big town where there are too many charlatans, but it's not too good for a city like Springfield where the number of top-notch teachers is limited. The sole bright ray of hope is that she may be able to adjust her schedule to take in a day or two of Springfield teaching each week.

* * *

Because of the glamor connected with the concerts, it is easy to overlook the serious, quiet work that is going on daily at the Berkshire Music center. Dr Koussevitzky's far-seeing dream is already producing results.

* * *

Far beyond the thousands who can get to Tanglewood, there will be millions who will delight in the music that will be written at Tanglewood and in the musicians who are being trained there. That is a long-range investment that cannot be overemphasized. Such a project needs support and contributions to the Berkshire Music center are always welcome.

* * *

One immediate benefit from such contributions is a chance to sit in at the Saturday-morning rehearsals of the orchestra. We particularly remember the first such rehearsal we heard. It was worth everything just to see the doctor—and don't call him the old doctor, even if he was 72 last week—work on those men and work on that music. Membership also permits hearing such treats as the premiere of "Peter Grimes" next Tuesday.

* * *

The people who bemoan the low caliber of American music had cause to sing a slightly different tune when they had a chance to hear the Aaron Copland suite, "Appalachian Spring," last Sunday. Mr Copland, whose "Quiet City" has already been a Tanglewood success, is assistant to Dr Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music center, and his score was given as warm a reception as any composer could hope for.

* * *

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 2 - 1946

TANGLEWOOD TO GIVE 9TH OF BEETHOVEN

Symphony to Close Festival Aug. 11; 'Peter Grimes' Cast Selected

Tanglewood, Aug. 2—Serge Koussevitzky has chosen four [illegible] now studying in the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood in Lenox to be the soloists in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony in the Berkshire festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The Ninth symphony will bring the festival to a close under Dr Koussevitzky's direction on August 11.

The quartet will include Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor; James Pease, bass.

The cast [illegible] selected for the three performances of "Peter Grimes," the opera [illegible] have its first American production by the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood on August 6, 7 and 8.

"Peter Grimes" was composed for Tanglewood by commission of the Koussevitzky Music foundation. The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute. The leading soprano part (Ellen) will be sung alternately by Florence Manning and Frances Yeend.

Balstrode will be sung by James Pease. The cast will include: Ellen Carleen, Irene [illegible], Frances Lehnerts, Mildred [illegible], Phyllis Smith, Duane Crossley, Paul Franke, Robert Gay, Paul [illegible], Matthew Lockhart, Robert [illegible], Edward Treash, Frederic Zighera.

Eric Crozier, who directed the production at Sadlers Wells in London, and Benjamin Britten, the composer of "Peter Grimes," are to assist in the production here. Richard Rychtarik is the stage designer.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 2 - 1946

ARRAU SOLOIST IN NEW SERIES

Tanglewood Weather Cold, Audience Warm

By Willard M. Clark

LENOX, Aug. 1—Cold, unpleasant weather greeted the thousands who thronged Tanglewood tonight to usher in the second series of the Berkshire festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

This series of three concerts will be devoted to the works of Johannes Brahms. Soloists to be heard include the pianist Claudio Arrau, who played the first piano concerto tonight; the Negro contralto, Carol Brice, who appears Saturday night in the "Rhapsody for Contralto and Male Chorus"; and Erica Morini, violinist and Gregory Piatigorsky, the cellist, who will be heard in the double concerto for violoncello and orchestra Sunday afternoon.

Take the conducting genius of a Koussevitzky, add to it the virtuosi who make up the Boston Symphony Orchestra; give them the music of Johannes Brahms to play and you have an unbeatable combination. At least that is what the huge audience seemed to think tonight. There was tremendous applause following every number and a veritable ovation for Claudio Arrau following his stirring performance.

The dark, brooding music which made up the majority of the program seemed in tune with the weather. From the opening crashing chords of the "Tragic Overture" to the herculean finale of the fourth symphony there was a continuous surge of mighty music, towering to the skies, with only passages of nostalgic beauties to relieve them.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
THE PEOPLE'S VOICE

AUG 3 - 1946

With Symphony

CAROL BRICE, who has rapidly climbed the ladder of concert success, will be heard with the Boston Symphony under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky on Saturday, August 3, [illegible] p.m. over the American Broadcasting System (WJZ). Miss Brice, contralto, will sing Brahms's "Alto Rhapsody," assisted by the orchestra and male chorus. The broadcast will originate from Tanglewood, Mass., and is one in the series sponsored by the Berkshire Musical Festival being held this year for the first time since the end [illegible] war. Director Koussevitzky was one of the first musicians of rank to recognize Miss Brice's outstanding talent.

---

ittsfield, Massachusetts. Saturday, August 3, 1

Three Top Flight Soloists To Be Heard at Festival

Carol Brice Appears With Boston Symphony Tonight, Gregor Piatigorsky And Erica Morini Tomorrow

Carol Brice

Erica Morini

Carol Brice, contralto, Erica Morini, violinist, and Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, will be the soloists in the second and third all-Brahms program of the Berkshire Festival tonight and tomorrow afternoon. The concerts will be the fifth and sixth in the series of nine by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

Miss Brice, whom Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen to sing in Brahms' Rhapsody for contralto solo, male chorus and orchestra, was the first of her race to win the Naumberg Award, a debut in Town Hall, New York. Daughter of a Congregational minister, and a teacher, she was born in Indianapolis and grew up in Sedalia, N. C., where her aunt, Dr. Charlotte Hawkins Brown, founded the Palmer Memorial Institute.

Studied at Juilliard

After graduating from Talladega College in Alabama, Miss Brice won a fellowship at the Juilliard School and a place in the chorus of the "Hot Mikado" at the World's Fair. She appeared in "The Chaplet," an early English opera at the Museum of Modern Art and in 1940 at the third inauguration of President Roosevelt and at the White House. She has sung with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under Fritz Reiner, the Kansas City Symphony Orchestra, the Yale Glee Club and in recital this season at Town Hall and Carnegie Hall.

Erica Morini, who will be soloist, with Piatigorsky, in the Concerto for Violin and Violoncello with Orchestra tomorrow afternoon made her debut in Leipzig at the age of eight under the baton of Artur Nikisch, at one time conductor of the Boston Orchestra. She studied and appeared in Europe before coming to the United States in her late teens. She has toured Australia and the Orient, as well as Europe and this country. Now an American citizen, she makes her home in New York.

Gregor Piatigorsky has for several seasons been a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center and has played at the Festival and in the Community Concerts Series in Pittsfield. He is director of the school's chamber music. Born in Russia, he has played since he was six. After accompanying the movies at the age of nine he was appointed at 15 first 'cellist at the Imperial Opera in Moscow.

Crossed to Poland

Crossing the border into Poland in the Russian revolution, he went from Warsaw to Berlin and in 1929 came to the United States, where he played with the Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic Orchestras. In 1942 he became an American citizen at Elizabethtown, N. Y., where he lives in the summer. He is head of the 'cello department at the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia, his winter home.

All seats for the two concerts in the Festival Shed have been reserved for several weeks, but admissions will be sold at the box office so that as many as wish may listen from the benches outside and the lawns.

Following are the week-end programs:

Tonight

Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90
 Allegro con brio
 Andante
 Poco allegretto
 Allegro
Rhapsody for contralto solo, male chorus and orchestra, Op. 53
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73
 Allegro non troppo
 Adagio non troppo
 Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino
 Allegro con spirito
Festival chorus
Trained by Robert Shaw

Sunday Afternoon

Variations on a theme by Haydn, Op. 56A
Concerto for violin and violoncello with orchestra, in A minor, Op. 102 Allegro
 Andante
 Vivace non troppo
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
 Un poco sostenuto
 Andante sostenuto
 Un poco allegretto e grazioso
 Adagio: allegro non troppo, ma con brio

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

AUG 2 - 1946

CAROL BRICE, winner of the 1944 Naumberg Award, has been selected by Serge Koussevitzky to sing Brahms' Alto Rhapsody with the Boston Symphony at the Berkshire Festival in Lenox, Mass., tomorrow. The program will be heard on WJZ-ABC at 9:30 p.m.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 3 - 1946

Brahms Week End Opens At Berkshire Festival

Arrau Is Piano Soloist With Boston Symphony

Special to the Herald Tribune

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 1.—A week end of Brahms opened Thursday at Tanglewood with the first of a series of three concerts in the Berkshire Music Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted, with Claudio Arrau as soloist in the Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor.

Mr. Arrau was born in Chile and gave his first recital at five in Santiago. While a student, Mr. Arrau won the Liszt and Bach prizes. Since a recital at Carnegie Hall in 1941, he has averaged 100 appearances a year.

The other two numbers on tonight's program were the Tragic Overture, Op. 81, and Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98.

Showers kept down tonight's audience to the 6,500 capacity of the music shed.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

AUG 3- 1946

Closeup of a Koussevitzky Rehearsal

Festival Offers Informal View of His Technique

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 3.—One of the magnets for the music lovers gathered here in the Berkshires is the Saturday morning rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, of course, presiding. The following is an account of last Saturday's warm-up which can be spoken of as being typical of them all.

At ten o'clock in the morning, the music lovers occupy a good half of the Tanglewood music shed, expectant and quivering with the excitement that comes with being privileged to sit in on secret doings. More are drifting in.

The orchestral sounds have a whip-like echo, which is missing when the shed is capacity full. All the musicians are coatless, and the conductor himself is too. He sits on a high stool before his forces, going through the most casual beats imaginable. Nothing like the tenseness of the actual performance.

Quite An Experience.

Pretty soon what seems like a laggardly attitude—which is easily understandable at such an ungodly hour—is gone, and in its place there is great alertness from all participating. It's the heart of rehearsals.

Students, visitors, are everywhere. The shed fills up rapidly. More coming in all the time. Everybody in informal attire. Women in slacks, men shirtless. Communing with Tschaikowsky without inhibitions.

A stiffish breeze wings its way through the awning at the sides of the shed. There are strained, almost too attentive looks on the faces of the listeners, now. The musical drama unfolds episodically as Koussevitzky pauses to instruct his minions from time to time.

Food is to be had here, and coffee and soft drinks, during the rehearsal. You pay for it, naturally. It's quite snappy and there is an autumnal feel about. Must be the music.

A little family, father, mother and one, two, three, four youngsters troop in very quietly. Another family, only parents and one child, this time. Exposing the young ones to music early in life.

Sun and Warm Music.

In back of me I am surprised to find two solid rows of nuns, and to one and a score of priests.

Where did they come from so suddenly? This certainly adds the devotional look to matters.

The sun is making things warm now, as Koussevitzky makes things hot on the stage. The Tschaikowsky Fifth sends out a thermal glow. Everybody bathes in it. The suns rays, reflected from innumerable mirrors of nature, weave designs on the back wall of the shed. Short-lived mosaics, but beautiful.

Passionate conviction, fiery oratory explode from the instrumental body. Koussevitzky touches off blast after blast with his quick, nervous gestures, and the echoes ring through the amphitheater and surge out into the open spaces, onto the lawn and beyond. Suddenly, with one sharp piercing chord the Tschaikowsky closes off.

Rehearsal Grind.

Sighs escape from the massed listeners, who wait for a moment, then break into loud applause. The conductor bows slightly, but in a second or two the Boston Symphony is back at work. And, before we know it, we are in the middle of a storm—the music, as you can guess, Beethoven's "Pastorale."

Stop and start. Begin and repeat all over again. Perfection is what the batonist is seeking. He apparently gets it. Then more measures, more repetition, more refining. Koussevitzky shrills out more instructions—over the huge sound of the music. The men hear and he smiles, gratefully.

A gradual decline in sonority, so subtly paced, so like a thinning thread off a spinning wheel. Then silence. The rehearsal is over.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STAR

AUG 3 - 1946

Koussevitsky Gives Shostakovitch's Ninth

It isn't given to all men to realize their dreams. But Serge Koussevitzky in introducing another "first" to his already long list, as he will on Aug. 10 when he conducts the Boston Symphony's air premiere of Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony from the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. (ABC-WCOL, 8:30 p. m.), once again knows the satisfaction of a dream fulfilled.

Many years ago, the youthful Koussevitsky, already considered one of the world's great conductors, chafed under the restrictions placed upon new music by the limitations of the concert hall. It was his great desire that millions of people hear music—new and old—the millions who could not come to the concert hall. Music to the young conductor, as it is to him now, was a means of forging bonds among people—a method of communication as important as waterways, ships, trains.

So, at his own expense, the young Koussevitsky chartered a boat and gathered together his own orchestra. Up and down the Volga River they traveled and played symphonic programs to the remote towns and villages of Russia that had never before heard such music.

Now the broadcasts of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitsky's direction is the extension and modernization of his early method of bringing music to millions of people.

Dr. Koussevitsky was the first conductor to recognize the genius of Shostakovitch and to introduce him to American audiences. When he played Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony, musical criticism was either diffident or scathing. Koussevitsky was wroth—reached the boiling point. He said the critics were wrong and that he would play Shostakovitch until they saw the light.

Koussevitsky continued to play the Fifth and played it on tour. Finally Koussevitsky and Shostakovitch were vindicated in the article by Warren Storey of The Boston Post who wrote, "This critic hereby eats humble pie with reference to Shostakovitch and in particular to his Fifth Symphony. Not only does he revise his opinion of the Fifth but also of the other Shostakovitch works."

Other critics have also long since eaten "humble pie"—and their own words—as Shostakovitch has assumed his rightful place among the great men of music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

AUG 3- 1946

Rhythm and Reason

Music Comes From Anywhere At Tanglewood Music Center

By Harriett Johnson

Music at Tanglewood during the six-week season of the Berkshire Music Center goes on all day and far into the night. I hotfooted it yesterday from house to barn to shed to theatre on the 200-acre framed estate. I listened to all kinds of varieties of sound from a clarinetist practicing in a field to Bob Shaw jitterbugging on a soap box in a barn, meanwhile getting wonderful sounds out of his Bach chorus.

The swank Berkshire festival with its three series of weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (the second is now in progress) is no more important than the associated daily music-making which is part of the center. During lunch on the grounds I sat at a picnic table drinking a bowl of Boston clam chowder and surrounded by conductors, operatic aspirants, choral students, instrumentalists and composers. Each talked faster and louder than the other about his particular enthusiasm. Hugh Ross, not in the best of humor because of an abscessed tooth, arrived on the scene, having spent the morning with a chorus rehearsal of "Peter Grimes," the opera by the Englishman Benjamin Britten, which has its American premiere at Tanglewood on Tuesday. Alice Edman, wife of the editor of the Berkshire Eagle, and unofficial collector of properties for the opera, emerged with three rickety chairs and two ancient-looking lanterns, which she had borrowed from E. P. Palmer, Pittsfield cabinet maker.

"Shocked at Tristan"

With my cup of coffee still hot in my throat, I trotted, after lunch, into the rustic theatre to watch the progress of Richard Rychtarik's scene-designing class As I made my way through masses of colored gelatins and boxes of 1,000-watt bulbs I noticed a teen-aged girl in spattered blue denims lugging a tin pail of water across the stage. "I'm going to mix some paints," she volunteered. Upon questioning, she turned out to be Sylvia Pfeiffer, stepdaughter of William Steinberg, conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic. "I saw my first opera last year in San Francisco," she said. "It was 'Tristan' and I was shocked by the dreadful scenery. I went there with my father. He conducted. I've always been interested in art, and I'm going to study stage designing. Seriously, I think I can improve things."

She swung a big brush through what looked like a charcoal brew. At that point a young man of 14 came up to help her. He turned out to be Burton Bernstein, brother of Leonard. "He's supposed to be here for a vacation, but we've put him to work on the stage," said Rychtarik. The designer has seven girls and three boys in his class, but he finds the feminine contingent more apt. They may not be born to the hammer but they swing it with more precaution than the men," he said. "The boys are too hasty and grab a brush or put in a nail without a second thought. It'd be better if they hesitated a little. See?"—he grinned and held up a bandaged finger — "Even I don't know any better!"

Disentangling myself from a mass of cables used for the stage lights I walked out of the building down toward one of the exits from the grounds. On the way I stopped at Bob Shaw's rehearsal. He was in his shirtsleeves working as heatedly as Harry James or Tommy Dorsey to get the kind of sound he wanted in the "Magnificat." His body rocked with rhythm, and intermittently in his intensity he fell off his soapbox. Meanwhile his chorus achieved miraculous results while almost to a man (and woman) chewing gum.

Tanglewood, where Hawthorne wrote "The House of Seven Gables"; where Herman Melville and Hawthorne became friends; where, only a few miles distant, Melville wrote "Moby Dick." Today Tanglewood is a place of memories and association. Today it is also a place where great music, conviviality and ideas mix in the most agreeable kind of blend.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

AUG 3 - 1946

TWO SINGERS WELL KNOWN IN CLEVELAND, Mildred Mueller and Leonard Treash, will appear in the American premiere performance of Benjamin Britten's new opera, "Peter Grimes," when it is performed at the famous Berk-hire Music Festivals in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., next Tuesday, Wednesday nd Friday under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Richard Rychtarik, forner Clevelander, designed the sets for the production. Miss Mueller is a grad-ate of the Cleveland Institute of Music and Treash is head of the voice departnent at Baldwin-Wallace Conservatory of Music, Berea.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Student Orchestra Is as Good as Cleveland or Cincy--Koussevitsky

The Tanglewood of today includes a [illegible] orchestra "as good as Cleveland or Cincinnati," Dr. Serge Koussevitzky told a highly amused audience of 600 gathered at the Berkshire Museum last night for the annual summer members' night program.

Koussevitzky [illegible] Out

Speaking briefly on the future of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor inflicted bruises and contusions on large numbers of composers and musicians. Only Moussorgsky, Wagner and Bizet pass his primary requirements for good opera, the development of which he sees as an important phase of the Tanglewood of tomorrow. With a gesture, he dismissed Puccini, Mascagni and the other Italian composers as creators of "banal" works, none of which fulfill his requisites for "musical drama." The greatest opera of all, he declared, is "Carmen."

"Avoid the Banal"

At the Center, he said, "We want to avoid the banal, the routine. We need the opera in America, the real opera. I hope one day every state will have the opera." They will get it, he implied, at least partially through the impetus furnished as this phase of Tanglewood's future develops. He sees, ultimately, a center which will attract "the greatest writers, painters and musicians" of the age, and hopes for the construction of a Greek amphitheatre seating 25,000.

Of the past, Dr. Koussevitzky had to say that American musical culture started in earnest 25 years ago and "now can stand with anybody." He gave the Boston Symphony credit for contributing greatly to this development, being "the first great orchestra in the country." Much of the Boston Symphony's influence in the growth of American musical culture, he attributed to a succession of conductors who tried to "bring something new" to the symphonic field.

Of the Berkshire Music Center of today, he said, "Every one of us who works there, works for the art of music." He mentioned the course for conductors, the first such school in America, and said that although "one cannot learn to conduct in six weeks, we can nurture imagination and feeling." He won his biggest laugh of the eve-health requirements.

Koussevitzky
Continued on Second Page

Koussevitzk[illegible]

Continued From [illegible]st Page

ning, when reviewing the activities of the student orchestra, he admitted that at the end of the first week, "we were depressed by the orchestra," but that "by the end of the third week, it was as good as Cleveland or Cincinnati."

Introduced by Brown

Dr. Koussevitzky was introduced by John Nicholas Brown of Newport, R.I., a trustee of the Boston Symphony, who presented the conductor as "the master of the masters of the past."

The program marked the official opening of an exhibition of French Impressionist painters, a collection of pictures and memorabilia of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a group of photographs by Charles H. Vickery of Pittsfield. Refreshments were served in the Ellen Crane Memorial Room. More than 600 attended.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

A[illegible]46

Singers Picked At Tanglewood

As a result of auditions held last week, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen four singers now studying in the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox to be the soloists in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Ninth Symphony will bring the Festival to a close under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction on August 11. The quartet is to include Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor; James Pease, bass. These singers come from various parts of the country, an indication of the diverse geopraphical sources of the student body of the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Yeend is from the State of Washington; Miss Alberts from Brookline, Massachusetts; Joseph Laderoute from Canada; James Pease from Indiana.

The cast is also announced for the three performances of "Peter Grimes," the opera which will have its first American production by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood on August 6, 7, 9. "Peter Grimes" was composed for Tanglewood by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute. The leading soprano part (Ellen) will be sung alternately by Flornece Manning and Frances Yeend. Balstrode will be sung by James Pease. The cast will include: Ellen Carleen, Irene Jordan, Frances Lehnerts, Fildred Mueller, Phyllis Smith, Duane Crossley, Paul Franfle Robert Gay, Paul Knowles, Matthew Lockhart, Robert Long, Leonard Treash, Frederic Zighera.

Eric Crozier, who directed the production at Sadlers Wells in London, and Benjamin Britten, the composer of "Peter Grimes," are both on their way from England to assist in the production here. Richard Rychtarik is the stage designer.

Cpl. Keating And Other Troopers Are Promoted

Aug 3

Cpl. Joseph A. Keating

Acting Corporal Joseph A. Keating of Lee barracks, State Police, was promoted to the rank of full corporal yesterday. Commissioner of Public Safety John P. Stokes made the announcement which included the promotions of other state policemen who have been assigned to this area. Keating is in charge of the Lee detachment.

Other promotions: Acting Sergeant Michael J. Sullivan at Northampton formerly of Lee, to full sergeant, Cpl. Timothy Flynn, Cpl. Charles J. O'Connor, both formerly of Lee, to full sergeants.

In addition to Keating other acting corporals raised to the full rank are: Walter Burke at Monson, Lawrence Irving at Shelburne Falls, James Cronin at Brookfield and Joseph D. Gahm at Russell, all formerly assigned to the Lee or Pittsfield barracks.

It is expected that a shift in the state police personnel will follow these promotions. However Commissioner Stokes has given no hint of such action yet.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER

AUG 4 - 1946

ON AUGUST 4, at Tanglewood, at the Berkshire Festival, one of the few surviving perfect violoncelli made by Stradivari, the fabulous 250-year-old "Lord Aylesford," will make its concert debut. It will be introduced by its new owner, Gregor Piatigorsky, who acquired it a few weeks ago at a price not disclosed but rumored to have been unusually high.

The "Lord Aylesford" was made by Antonio Stradivari in Cremona in 1696. According to careful calculations, of all the instruments made by Stradivari, [illegible] violins, 12 violas and [illegible] 'celli are actually known today.

Of the 'celli' fewer than 10 are in perfect condition. Of these the "Lord Aylesford" is considered by experts to be one of the finest. The instrument was brought from Italy to London in 1780, where it was bought by Lord Aylesford. Later it passed into other private hands.

Tanglewood Shed Filled As All-Brahms Week Opens

Claudio Arrau Is Complete Master Of Keyboard in First Piano Concerto—Rain Fails To Dampen Enthusiasm

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Last night's concert at Tanglewood was the first of this week end's three in which Serge Koussevitzky leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the second week of the ninth Berkshire Festival. An audience which filled every seat under the huge Shed and all the auxiliary benches and seats under the protection of the lateral corridors gave the Boston orchestra's famous leader and the soloist of the evening, the pianist Claudio Arrau, the same vociferous and enthusiastic merited evidence of their all-out approval as is the rule at this unique musical institution.

All Brahms Program

The cause of the release of all the acclamation was the high standards of performance which have been maintained without deviation at these concerts. Last night the entire program was devoted to music of Johannes Brahms. The orchestra played the "Tragic Overture," and the fourth symphony and accompanied Mr. Arrau in the first piano concerto, (in D minor).

Opinions concerning orchestras usually are influenced by the last occasions one has had to hear them, thus, memories of the lucid transparency of the Boston orchestra's Mozart might lead us to say that there is their forte, and then, after last night's program, one is convinced that in the intricacies of Brahms they have their best chance to show their mettle. Certain it is that one of the great musical pioneers of the last century does give the Bostonians an opportunity to show many facets of their brilliance which other composers might not unveil. Noticeable particularly last night was the substance and ability of every section and of every individual of the orchestra. Each one held up his responsibility with musical integrity, and there enters the true measure of their conductor, who by subtle and keen senses of balance and perspective keeps them in control and under the artistic discipline which sums up to such superlative performances.

Soloist Recalled

After the soloist's sixth recall we lost count, but no one will quite forget the galvanic impression he made in the concerto. He played with heroic dominance. The tremendous difficulties of the keyboard were overcome with complete mastery so that he was able, as his artistic judgment prompted him, to give even the most gigantic handfuls of notes and chords a soft and poetic touch. And in the slow movement nothing would quite convey the manner of his conception so well as the indication Brahms himself desired: "Molto dolce ed expressivo." He was not tempted by the vast spaces in which the audience faced him to alter his exquisitely lovely tone to more stentorian proportions.

While it is a measure of the present-day acceptance of Brahms to have three programs exclusively of his music, there was still evidence last night why it has had to meet and combat opposition during its near 100 years of existence. The piano concerto as an orchestral background which is of much more importance and of beauty than had been the accompaniments of previous composers' concertos, and thus the matter of balance between soloist and accompaniment becomes a special problem. The orchestra's assignment is worthy of eloquent statement, but a reverberating tympani prevented us from hearing the elementally-rhythmed but awkwardly placed, majestic introduction of the concerto. Poor Brahms sometimes has to fight more than a reluctant audience.

Tempo of Fourth Fast

The proper tempo of Brahms symphonies, specifically this fourth, has always been a subject of heated discussions. Dr. Koussevitzky elicited beautiful tonal quality from his orchestra, but he did not realize the inflections of tender queries we think Brahms has planted, and it would be our contention that at his speed it is less feasible. However, here the orchestral balance was superb. In the later movements, they were in their most felicitous moods. The horns, trombones, and bassoons, in their famous episode in the last movement made tones of incomparable loveliness.

The light rain which had been falling during the early evening was but a slight nuisance and hardly a hindrance to the large audience which, as usual, arrived in sufficient time to be seated in ample time for the prompt start of the concert, but very few wraps and blankets remained unused in the unusually chill air of an early August evening. Koussevitzky appeared in conventional black tuxedo, for the first time at a Berkshire festival concert, and Mr. Arrau, during the long orchestral introduction to his concerto, stroked and kneaded his hands, to keep them in trim for his entrance.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

AUG 3 - 1946

BIG PLANS MADE FOR TANGLEWOOD

Koussevitzky Tells Museum Members He Hopes Musical Center Will Have Theater and Stadium

Pittsfield, Aug. 2 — Speaking to an audience that filled every seat in the Berkshire Museum theater tonight, with a large overflow audience, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, envisioned a glorious future for Tanglewood.

He said he hoped it would sometime be a world center for composers, artists and dramatists as well as a great musical center. He pictured a great theater and a stadium with a seating capacity of 25,000 persons, and looked forward to the production of operas.

He addressed an audience of men and women who had gathered for the annual museum summer members' night. Dr Koussevitzky's talk was one of the features of the program, which included also a pictorial exhibit relating to the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

One of those in the audience was Mrs Frank P. Gannett, wife of the publisher, who is at the head of a national musical organization that is to build a replica of the Nathaniel Hawthorne cottage on the original site. Mrs Gannett said later that a part of the fund for the building of the cottage had been raised and the plans have been drawn by Andrew H. Hepburn of Concord.

On exhibition were portraits of the founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, its best-known conductors and artists, photographs and memorabilia. On display also was a large exhibit entitled "French Impressionist Painting." Visitors also saw photographs by Charles H. Vickery of this city.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 4 - 1946

10,500 at Tanglewood Concert

Special to the Herald Tribune

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 3.—The fifth festival concert of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood drew 10,000 tonight, which is 500 less than a week ago tonight. With perfect weather, several thousand were seated on lawn blankets. Interest in this second all-Brahms program was unabated, with a sellout for the closing of the second series tomorrow afternoon.

NEW YORK, N.
TIMES

AUG 4 -

MISS BRICE S
AT BERKSHIR

Young Contralto
Chorus and Or Second Brahms

By OLIN DOW
Special to The New
LENOX, Mass., Au
Brice, the young Negr
was soloist this evening
ond of the Brahms prog
Berkshire Music Fest performance of that rhapsody, op. 53, which ting of verses from
"Harzreise."
Aside from the inte
noble and rarely heard Serge Koussevitzky h with it an ideal backgr quality of Miss Brice's beautiful voice is riche effective in its lowe which is characteristic of organ. The upper still, perhaps, fully to to be brought under co trol. And Brahms' mus wide skips, so dramatic tion, from high to low much of the singer.
But the voice is fresh in all its registers, and showed herself a musi telligence and taste in ment of the melodic li not "emote" or exagge expression of the feelin this music, is not of variety.
Indeed, a nearly maintenance of line ency of style goes meeting the effect th
poser evidently intende was like a gorgeously against the tapestry of tral and choral son
music spoke for itself, poser intended, in term emotion and classic be

Excellent Effect of

The chorus, in turn had prepared its part while Miss Brice, unde derstanding, had prepa
the original German, made face of the difficulties which contrasts occasioned, an ex effect. It was in terms of phonic rather than a textu pression that the performan ceeded. With no text at mood would have been conv Much more could be said festival chorus, which has working so zealously und enthusiastic leadership of Shaw, and has performed tonishing number of im choral compositions in suc
weekly programs of the Be Music Center season. It ha in the afternoon, in Church, the highly modern anies a la Vierge Noire," b lenc, and the Bach Magnific
The same body will si very difficult choral parts them too at the America
mière of Benjamin Britten's
"Peter Grimes," on Tuesday week they were heard in their weekly programs in cantata, "Christ Lag in To den." Their achievements sets of this festival.
The symphonies of the e were Brahms' Third and his S which concluded the concer
the last named performance tion may not be made here the playing of the Third sym was conspicuous for two the exceptional clarity of the sition of theme and counter and the spirit, now fiery, now al, and fundamentally which clothed the interpre

Rehearsal Heard in Mo

And this morning, at th hearsal," which is a earsal, but also a variety ert when full programs ared in the presence of udience of subscribers estival, there was the une to hear Erica Mo regor Piatigorsky as so he Brahms double conc violin and orchestra. For ascination of these re which are final stages of tion, are as significant as certs, because the interp can be followed as they are and put together.
There were interesting ments of tempo this mor tween the orchestra and soloists, as the perfect attained. And there was son to grasp the fine authority of Miss Morin the mature and arresting ter, and the virtuoso pro phenomenal tone of Pia with his newly acquired varius 'cello.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 4 - 1946

Carol Brice Heard in Brahms at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Aug. 3.—The second concert of series "B" of this Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was given tonight by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. The audience of 9500 responded warmly to the Tangle[illegible]but of Carol Brice, Negro contralto, who sang the "Rhapsody, Opus 53" in this all-Brahms series of three concerts.

Last Thursday night we were unable to report on the post-intermission performance of the "Symphony No. 4, in E Minor, Opus 98," owing to the lateness of the hour, so we offer our opinions at this time.

Striking Drama

Not being an unrestricted Brahmsian, we find it impossible to write with unbounded enthusiasm of this work, and yet we do not hesitate to acknowledge the striking drama revealed in the playing of the first and last movements, as well as a lack of tiresome reiteration in the "andante moderato." Most worthy of note was the close-knit qualities of the "allegro jiocoso" which could easily lapse into loose fragmentary impressions.

The brass section played admirably and even the most "exposed" phrases were tonally beyond reproach. Still, one sensed a constant striving for climax that is so typically Brahms. To say that Thursday night's "Symphony No. 4" was a completely satisfying musical experience would be an admission of contentment with its spasmodic but ever interrupted climaxes. To criticize its performance by the orchestra or its interpretation by the conductor would be equally difficult.

F Major More Assertive

Tonight's program opened with the "Symphony No. 3, in F Major, Opus 90." Here is Brahms in a more directly assertive mood. Perhaps it was only a reflection of my own reaction, but it seemed to me that Koussevitzky was more deeply engaged with the drive of this symphony than any other work heard so far in these Brahms concerts.

The first three movements ha multi-shaded qualities of Bravu ra, docility, vigor, and serenit

It was in the last movement, however, (as intended by Brahms) that a thrilling climax was reached. It has been aptly described as a tremendous conflict of elemental forces."

I am not suggesting that Koussevitzky is an infallible judge of new artists. But I do point to a conspicuous absence of failures among his proteges, unless you are unwilling to acknowledge the brilliant careers of Maynor, Bernstein, Sanroma, and others who were helped by the conductor early in their careers.

Heart-Warming Voice

The "Rhapsody for Contralto, Male Chorus, and Orchestra" is far from a conclusive work by which to judge Carol Brice. There is no denying her possession of a luscious, heart-warming voice, opulent in its low register, although lacking in resonance in its highest tones. The Brahms score does not provide the melodic continuity in which Miss Brice's voice undoubtedly is heard to better advantage. From the interpretative standpoint, Miss Brice was thoroughly schooled in the three stanzas from Goethe's "Werther's Leiden" which Brahms modeled into this none-too-exciting score. The male chorus was coached by Robert Shaw, which speaks amply for itself.

The program closed with the "Symphony No. 2 in D Major," the discussion of which will be included in tomorrow's review of the final concert in this Brahms series. Tomorrow afternoon's soloists are Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN

AUG 4 - 1946

Laderoute Is Auditions Winner in Berkshires; Syracuse Recitalists

By E. V. W.

JOSEPH LADEROUTE, tenor, who sang in Fine Arts College a few seasons ago with the University Chorus, Dr. Howard Lyman directing, is among Berkshire Music Center audition winners. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen four singers now studying in the Center in "Tanglewood," Lenox, Mass., to be the soloists in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Ninth Symphony will bring the Festival to a close under Dr. Koussevitsky's direction on Aug. 11. The quartet: Francis Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Mr. Laderoute; James Pease, bass. These singers come from various parts of the country, an indication of the diverse geographical sources of the seudent body in the Music Center. Miss Yeend is from the state of Washington; Miss Alberts from Brookline, Mass.; Mr. Laderoute from Canada; James Pease from Indiana.

THE CAST ALSO is announced for the three performances of "Peter Grimes," the opera which will have its first American production by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood on Aug. 6, 7, 9. "Peter Grimes" was composed for Tanglewood by commission of the Koussevitsky Music Foundation. The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute. The leading soprano part (Ellen) will be sung alternately by Florence Manning and Frances Yeend. Balstrode will be sung by James Pease. In the cast: Ellen Carleen, Irene Jordan, Frances Lehnerts, Mildred Mueller, Phyllis Smith, Duane Crossley, Paul Franke, Robert Gay, Paul Knowles, Matthew Lockhart, Robert Long, Leonard Treash, Frederic Zighera. Eric Crozier, who directed the production at Sadlers Wells in London, and Benjamin Britten, the composer of "Peter Grimes," are both on their way from England to assist in the Tanglewood production. Richard Rychtarik is stage designer.

HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 4 - 1946

"PETER GRIMES"

By Francis D. Perkins

FOR productions of new operas these days we are indebted to educational institutions. Columbia University staged Gian-Carlo Menotti's "The Medium" last May, and this week the Berkshire Music Center will produce Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes" for the first time in this country at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. It will be given on Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, with alternating casts and orchestras.

Judging by its record so far, and by the comments of English critics, "Peter Grimes" is a work of considerable consequence. It was produced in London on June 7 at the Sadler's Wells Theater, where it has had twenty-four performances. On the European continent it has been given in German at Basel and Zurich, in Flemish at Antwerp and in Swedish at Stockholm. Next season it is to be presented in London at Covent Garden, and in Prague, Brno, Budapest and Copenhagen. The Sea Interludes from Mr. Britten's score were played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home concerts of March 1 and 2, 1946, and in its Carnegie Hall concert of March 13.

The circumstances which led to the composition of "Peter Grimes" are described by Mr. Britten in a booklet published for the Sadler's Wells Foundation. On May 5, 1941, his operetta "Paul Bunyan," with a text by W. H. Anden, was produced at Columbia University by the Columbia Theater Associates. Although the New York critics damned it, "the public seemed to find something enjoyable in the performances," and Mr. Britten wanted to write more works for the stage. That summer, when in California, he read an article by E. M. Forster in "The Listener" about the English clergyman-poet, George Crabbe (1754-1832). Reading about Crabbe, who also was born in Suffolk, gave the composer a feeling of nostalgia for his native county, and Crabbe's "The Borough" provided a subject and a background from which he and Peter Pears (who sang the title role in the first London production) began to try to construct a scenario.

A few months later, when the Boston Symphony was playing his "Sinfonia dá Requiem." Sergei Koussevitzky asked Mr. Britten why he had not written an opera. Mr. Britten explained that such an undertaking would require a freedom from other work, which was an economic impossibility for most young composers. Interested in the project for an opera based on "The Borough," Mr. Koussevitzky arranged for the commissioning of the work through the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and the score is dedicated to the memory of his wife, Natalie Koussevitzy. On his return to England in April, 1942, Mr. Britten asked Montagu Slater to write the libretto. He began the score in January, 1944, and finished it thirteen months later.

Story and Characters

"The Borough", published in 1810, describes a Suffolk fishing and shipbuilding village such as Aldeborough, where Crabbe was born; its atmosphere, institutions, daily life and characters. One of these is the fisherman, Peter Grimes. Ernest Newman, writing in "The Sunday Times" of London, thinks that Crabbe's Grimes, as it stands, would not have made satisfactory material for opera, but that Mr. Slater "has wisely shown the self-haunted man as a complex of warring impulses, fatally prone to harshness but with a vein of poetic imagination running through him, a frustrated sensitive who breaks himself against the sharp angles of the world because he lacks the flexibility of spirit to steer past or round them." "For the rest," he adds, "all that Mr. Slater had to do was to condense and dovetail a few of Crabbe's other types, take them from the pitiless glass of the poet's microscope, and make them breathe and move in company." These other characters include Grime's silent apprentice; Ellen Orford, the schoolmistress (soprano); Capt. Balstrode, retired merchant skipper (barytone); Swallow, lawyer and coroner (bass); "Auntie" (contralto), the landlady of "The Boar", and her two "nieces" (sopranos), described as the main attractions of that inn; Robert Boles (tenor), a Methodist fisherman; Mrs. Sedley (soprano), "a rentier widow of an East Indian Company's factor"; Ned Keene (barytone), "apothecary and quack"; the rector, the Rev. Horace Adams (tenor), the carrier Hobson (bass), and the silent Dr. Crabbe. Grimes is a tenor. The period of the libretto has been moved up from 1810 to 1830.

Mr. Slater writes that he has used Crabbe's poem only as the starting point for his story. This can be told here only in an incomplete, much condensed form. Grimes's apprentice has died on a recent fishing trip; the coroner's verdict is accidental death, but it is given in such a way that Peter feels that he is still under suspicion. Disliked by most of his fellow townsmen, he is fiercely ambitious; he wishes to show the borough what he is made of; to make money and marry Ellen. She tries to comfort and encourage him, but finds this difficult.

Grimes secures a new apprentice from the workhouse; Ellen brings the boy to the inn and Grimes takes him to his home, a hut made out of a boat. On a fine Sunday morning a few weeks later Ellen is talking to the boy; she notices signs of ill treatment. Peter demands that the boy go to work with him, Sunday or no Sunday; Ellen's remonstrance leads to an argument; Peter strikes her; the boy runs from him and Peter follows. Suspicion of Peter's conduct arises in the gathering crowd, a group goes to his hut to investigate.

Hearing the approaching crowd, Peter prepares to leave the hut. The boy, starting down the cliff, slips and falls, screaming as he disappears. Peter follows him, the visitors find the hut empty. Three days later, after nothing has been heard of Grimes or the boy, Ellen finds the latter's jersey. A posse goes out to search for Grimes. A little later he reappears, almost insane. Balstrode proposes that he take his boat, sink it and go down with it. Grimes does what he is told. The posse returns empty-handed, and the borough resumes its daily life.

Most of the libretto is written in "four-beat half-rhymed verse, as conversational as possible and not too regular." Mr. Britten writes that he decided to reject the Wagnerian theory of "permanent melody" for the "classical practice of separate numbers that crystallize and hold the emotion of a dramatic situation at chosen moments." "Good recitative," he thinks, "should transform the natural intonations and rhythms of everyday speech into memorable musical phrases, but in more stylized music, the composer should not deliberately avoid unnatural stresses if the prosody of the poem and the [illegible] situation demand them, [illegible] of a high-hand[illegible] words, which may [illegible]ation far beyond th[illegible] speech-length, or a speed of delivery that would be impossible in conversation."

The cast includes William Horne and Joseph Laderoute as Grimes, Florence Manning and Frances Yeend as Ellen, James Pease as Balstrode and Ellen Carleen, Irene Jordan, Frances Lehnerts, Mildred Mueller, Phyllis Smith, Duane Crossley, Paul Franke, Robert Gay, Paul Knowles, Matthew Lockhart, Robert Long, Leonard Treash and Frederic Zighera in other roles. Leonard Bernstein will conduct, with Richard Rychtarik as stage director. Eric Crozier, who directed the London production of "Peter Grimes," and Mr. Britten will assist in this production.

Berkshire Festival

The second series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction closes this afternoon at Tanglewood with the following Brahms program, beginning at 3:30:

Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Double Concerto for violin and cello (soloists, Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky); Symphony No. 1.

The following programs are scheduled for the last week of the festival:

Thursday, Aug. 8, 8:15: Prokofieff, Symphony No. 5; Schumann, cello concerto (soloist, Gregor Piatigorsky); Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Saturday, 8:15: Schuman, American Festival Overture; Martinu, violin concerto (soloist, Mischa Elman); Shostakovitch, Symphony No. 9; Tchaikovsky, Francesca da Rimini. (Second half will be broadcast over ABC.)

Sunday, Aug. 11, 3:30: R. Thompson, The Testament of Freedom; Beethoven, Symphony No. 9.

The orchestra will hold a public rehearsal next Saturday morning at 10 o'clock.

Admission to the performances of "Peter Grimes" is by invitation to contributing members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Inquiries should be directed to the Berkshire Music Center at Lenox (Telephone, Lenox 530).

WILKES BARRE, PA.
INDEPENDENT

AUG 4 - 1946

Music Lovers Can Almost Predict How Often Favorites Will Be Played

By SCIENCE SERVICE

Music lovers listening to a series of symphony concerts could by studying past programs probably predict just how many times a favorite composer will be repeated or how often new compositions will be introduced during a season. A symphony conductor in selecting programs follows a more or less set pattern, although he may not be aware of it.

The leader of a dance band or band concert also gets a pleasing balance between new and familiar pieces by somewhat the same formula, states Dr. George Kingsley Zipf, of Harvard University.

Being "subconsciously" influenced by applause — its length, amount and intensity—and by remarks of music critics, a symphony conductor tends to have a "run" on one composer and then another, as vogues come and go. If selections are to be repeated at all, they are likely to reappear on the program soon after an ovation rather than following an interval of several years, Dr Zipf states in the Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology.

To discover what a popular contemporary conductor considers the right balance in a program, he studied the frequency with which a number of different pieces were played and how often the same composers appeared on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky over a ten year period.

Of the 541 different selections, 362 pieces were played but once, and 88 twice, while three were played as often as eight times and one appeared on the program almost every season. While some composers were scheduled but once and others repeated a single time, almost half of the composers whose pieces were played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during these 240 concerts averaged at least twice each season. Beethoven was played 59 times and Brahms 49 times during the ten ten years.

ASHEVILLE, N. C.
CITIZEN

AUG 4 - 1946

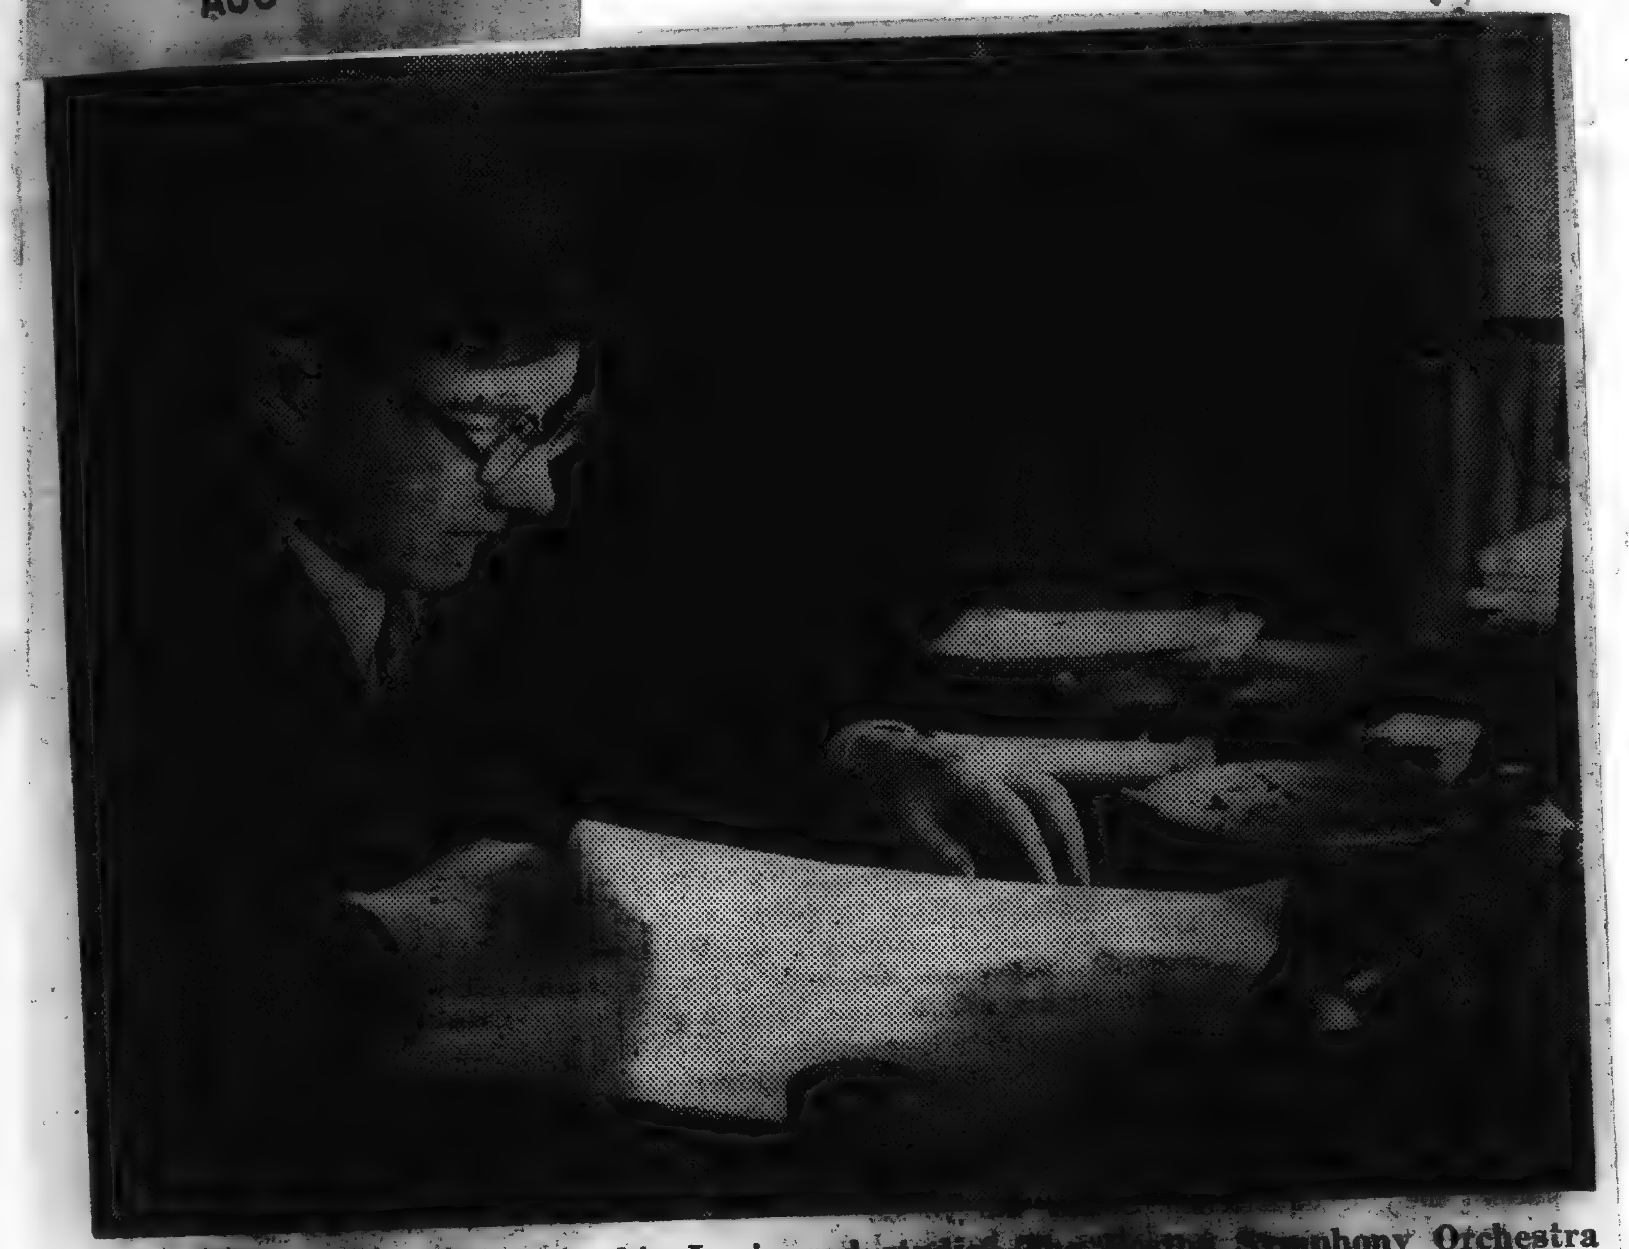
Saturday night Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducts the Boston Symphony in the first U. S. radio performance of Dmitri Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 9. Tchaikovsky's famous "1812 Overture" will also be heard when the Boston Symphony broadcasts the final program of this season's Berkshire Musical Festival Saturday night at [illegible] over WNCA-ABC.

"Detect and Co[illegible] in a moment of typical [illegible] is pictured in the curren[illegible] of Saturday Evening Post. [illegible] Lehr and his zany show is [illegible] Thursday evenings at 8:30.

"The May[illegible] Encino," Tom Breneman, [illegible] host for "Breakfast in Hollyw[illegible]," gives orchids, diamond rings and kisses to his guests each morning at 10:00 over WNCA-ABC, Monday through Friday. "Al Pearce and His Gang," have returned to the airwaves each weekday afternoon at 2:00. Tizzy Lish, "The Human Chatterbox," is a featured performer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

AUG 4 - 1946



Dmitri Shostakovich in his Leningrad studio. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Sergei Koussevitzky will perform the brilliant young composer's new Ninth Symphony over the ABC network (WJZ in New York) next Saturday, Aug. 10 from 9:30 to 10:30 p.m. This will be the first radio presentation of the work outside of the Sov Union. Tune in this thrilling event!

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT

AUG 4 1946

Catching The Beat In Music World Today

BY

INA WICKHAM

> "I shall know but one country—America
> "To it I owe my utter loyalty
> "The ends I aim at shall be for my Country
> "My God and Truth."
> —National Federation of Music Clubs Collect

THE most important event in the current music season, the long awaited American premiere of the Shostakovich Ninth Symphony, will occur on Saturday night, Aug. 10, when Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky conducts the Boston Symphony orchestra at the final concert of the 1946 Berkshire Music Festival. The symphony which is in E Flat Minor and listed as Opus 70, had its world premiere at Leningrad on Nov. 3, 1945 and was favorably hailed by music critics and the press. Dr. Koussevitsky who had benefactored the composer during the war by sending him manuscript paper was given the opportunity to present the first performance outside of Russia.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD

AUG 4 - 1946

PERMANENT

THOMPSON: THE TESTAMENT OF FREEDOM—On the bi-centennial of the birth of Thomas Jefferson the distinguished choral composer Randall Thompson set to music four passages from the works of America's first articulate democrat. The settings are sung and chanted by the Harvard glee club, directed by G. Wallace Woodworth, and played by the Boston symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in a recording which projects the feeling of Ballad for Americans and other patriotic effusions. Wi th the assistance of the printed words, The Testament of Freedom makes itself felt as a fresh means of expressing the philosophy of a liberty-loving land Without the text we are afraic the effect would be negative (Victor)

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

AUG 4 - 1946

Four Chosen To Sing At Tanglewood

Will Be Soloists in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony August 11

As a result of auditions held last week, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen four singers now studying in the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewod in Lenox to be the soloists in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Ninth Symphony will bring the festival to a close under Dr. Koussevitsky's direction on August 11. The quartet is to include Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor; James Pease, bass. These singers come from various parts of the country, an indication of the diverse geographical sources of the student body of the Berkshire Music Center. Miss Yeend is from the State of Washington; Miss Alberts from Brookline, Mass.; Joseph Laderoute from Canada; James Pease from Indiana.

Opera Cast.

The cast is also announced for three performances of "Peter Grimes," the opera which will have its first American production by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday. "Peter Grimes" was composed for Tanglewood by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. The title role will be sung alternately by William Horne and Joseph Laderoute. The leading soprano part (Ellen) will be sung alternately by Florence Manning and Frances Yeend. Balstrode will be sung by James Pease. The cast will include: Ellen Carleen, Irene Jordan, Frances Lehnerts, Mildred Mueller, Phyllis Smith, Duane Crossley, Paul Franke, Robert Gay, Paul Knowles, Matthew Lockhart, Robert Long, Leonard Treash, Frederic Zighera.

Eric Crozier, who directed the production at Sadlers Wells in London, and Benjamin Britten, the composer of "Peter Grimes," are both on their way from England to assist in the production here. Richard Rychtarik is the stage designer.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

AUG [illegible]

Music

By Edgar S. Van Olinda

THE second Sunday afternoon concert in Series B of the Berkshire Music Festival in the music shed of "Tanglewood" will be held this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. There are no reserved seats for this event, but tickets of admission to the grounds may be purchased at the box office, entitling early comers to sit in the unreserved sections at the various entrances to the shed. The program for this afternoon is as follows:

Variations on a Theme
Haydn
Concerto for violin and 'cello
Brahms
Soloists—Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky
Symphony, [illegible] C-minor
Brahms

The cast [illegible] first American performance of Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," which will be given at Tanglewood on Aug. 6, 7 and 9, includes William Horne, Joseph Laderoute, Florence Manning, Frances Yeend, James Pease, Ellen Carleen, Irene Jordan, Frances Yehnerth, Mildred Mueller, Phyllis Smith, Duane Crossley, Paul Franke, Robert Gay, Paul Knowles, Matthew Lockart, Robert Long, Leonard Treash and Frederick Zighera. The composer, and Eric Crozier, who directed the London production at Saddler Wells, last year, will assist in this production.

In the closing concert of the Berkshire festival on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 11, the soloists in Beethoven's "Ninth" symphony will be Miss Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Mr. Laderoute, tenor, and James Pease, bass. They were chosen by Dr. Koussevitzky from the vocal classes, as a result of auditions last week.

Carol Brice, young Negro contralto, whose rapid rise to fame has placed her in the front rank of contemporary singers, will be the third member of her race to have been heard at "Tanglewood," the other two being Marian Anderson and Dorothy Maynor. Miss Brice sang the [illegible] role, in the "Rhapsody for Contralto," by Brahms, last night.

The performance of "Opera Scenes," by the vocal students of the Berkshire Music Center in the Tanglewood theatre-concert hall, postponed from last Wednesday night, will be given Saturday afternoon, Aug. 10, at 3:30 o'clock.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS REGISTER

AUG 4 - 1946

We have been "covering" music professionally for nearly 30 years, and consequently are not easily swayed. But when we first heard her at the Berkshire Festival three years ago, with the Boston Symphony, there were unashamed tears in our eyes—like those which came with Chaliapin's "Boris" and Kreisler's playing of the simple tunes of the Vienna that once was. The enterprising Victor company has released several of her singles, and now sends us her first album (No. 1043), simply titled Sacred Songs.

And what sacred songs they are! Mendelssohn's Hear Ye, Israel from "Elijah," Handel's How Beautiful Are the Feet from "Messiah," the Hallelujah from the Mozart motet "Exultate" and three of Bach's finest conceptions—Now Let Every Tongue Adore Thee from the Nicolai chorale, Laudamus Te from the Mass in B-minor and Only Bleed and Break Thy Loving Heart from the Passion according to St. Matthew. She has sensitive accompaniment by orchestra under Syvam Levin except in the Nicolai-Bach selection, in which she is supported by the Philadelphia with Ormandy. They come complete on three 12-inch doubles.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

AUG 4 - 1946

[illegible] The American radio premiere of Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony will be presented by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra (KGKO, 7:30 p.m.), whose program will include also Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture," not "Francesca da Rimini" as announced earlier.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

AUG 4 - 1946

Berkshire Festival

WORD COMES from the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., of two signal honors which have been bestowed on Joseph Laderoute, Windsor tenor.

Detroiters will recall his appearance with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra as soloist, and as tenor soloist in Lehman's song cycle "In a Persian Garden."

Since going to New York, he has appeared under Toscanini's direction in the radio performance of Beethoven's "Fidelio."

Now, in the two major events of the Berkshire Festival, Laderoute has been chosen by Serge Koussevitzky for principal parts in the Beethoven Ninth Symphony, which closes the Festival on Aug. 11.

* * *

LADEROUTE'S OTHER appearance will be in the American premiere of the English Opera "Peter Grimes," by Benjamin Britten. He will alternate in the title role with William Horne on Aug. 6, 7 and 9.

The leading soprano part (Ellen) will be sung alternately by Florence Manning and Frances Yeend. Balstrode will be sung by James Pease in an all-American cast.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

AUG 4 - 1946

Berkshire Audience To Hear Rare 'Cello

New York, Aug. 3.—(UP)—At the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood M[illegible] the few surviving perfect violoncelli made by Stradivari, the fabulous 250-year-old "Lord Aylesford," will make its concert debut. It will be introduced by its new owner, Gregor Piatigorsky, who acquired it a few weeks ago at a price not disclosed but rumored to have been unusually high.

The "Lord Aylesford" was made by Antonio Stradivari in Cremona in 1696. According to careful calculations, of all the instruments made by Stradivari, 540 violins, 12 violas and 50 'celli are actually known today.

Of the 'celli, fewer than 10 are in perfect condition. Of these, the "Lord Aylesford" is considered by experts to be one of the finest. The instrument was brought from Italy to London in 1780, where it was bought by Lord Aylesford. Later it passed into other private hands.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

AUG 5 - 1946

KOUSSEVITZKY IS HEARD AT BEST

Boston Symphony Brahm's Evening at Tanglewood

By Evert C. Larson

A quiet, breezeless summer evening, in the heart of the ever beautiful Berkshire Hills, prevailed Saturday night when more than 10,000 summer-clad concert-goers filled Tanglewood's Shed and lawns to hear the second all-Brahms program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Highlighting the evening of music was the introduction to Tanglewood's audience the artistry of Carol Brice, who possesses a superlatively rich contralto voice with an astoundingly versatile range.

However, it appears to matter very little who is present on the stage in addition to Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, for the conductor's mannerisms have a hynotic quality that arrest liste•er's attention. Dr. Koussevitzky's appearance upon the podium is highly individualistic since he in no way resembles the "conservative" director whose chief movement is the rhythmic wave of a baton. The Boston Symphony's conductor holds a white, nine-inch baton that is secondary to his direction which involves his entire body.

Superb in Brahms

Brahms offers Dr. Koussevitzky the best in podium showmanship for Brahms wrote music eloquently; somber and moody as well as lyrical and boisterous. Those in the audience close to the stage, readily discerned the price Dr. Koussevitzky paid in nervous strain and fatigue as he wrenched from his talented musicians the interpretation he sought, demanded, and wasn't satisfied until he had received. Therefore the success of the Boston Symphony appears to lie in its director—genius and disciplinarian.

Biographers have written that Brahms was a very modest man. This personality characteristic is not carried over into his music for the second and third symphonies as well as his rhapsody for contralto and male chorus, express confidence. There is no wallowing in doubt, no stumbling, and no evasions.

"Symphony No. 3 in F Major," first on the Tanglewood program, opened with the fullness that is characteristic of Brahms, who believed music must not only be emotionally expressive, but it must also be perfect in form. The second movement, which features an ecclesiastic-like melody, was perfectly timed with the dimming of the day's light when evening's mantle of darkness enveloped the locale. It's poetic beauty may well be associated with the religious story of "The Sermon on the Mount."

Vibrant Fourth Movement

The beautiful third movement contain sone of the many folk-dance melodies Brahms so loved to fuse into his works, but it is the vibrant fourth movement that is filled with the tonal powers Brahms used in the finales of his four symphonies. It is here that the emotions are most affected as horns cry out triumphantly against the accelerated beating of drums and the listener is enraptured by the experience.

"Rhapsody for Contralto, Male Chorus and Orchestra," opus 53, based on three verses of a Goethe poem, was the work Carol Brice chose for her Tanglewood debut. The tonal qualities Miss Brice possesses are sung with such ease that the effect is exceptionally pleasureable. Singing the verses in German, an obstacle in itself, Miss Brice colored the poet's verses with a warm contralto, and as well entered the soprápo range with a sustained clarity that was, aside from being a delightful surprise, a manifestation of her versatility. During the last of the three verses, Miss Brice was joined by the Festival Chorus, under the direction of Robert Shaw, which gave the rhapsody a maturity appropriate for the finale. The ovation given Miss Brice, Dr. Koussevitzky, chorus and orchestra was unexceptionally long and remained unabated while the artists were off-stage inbetween bows.

Hummable Melodies

Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major" has often been referred to as "that pretty symphony." And not without reason. It contains more hummable melodies than any other of the composer's four, and has less of the brooding associated with his others. During the recent vogue of adapting classical music to modern love lyrics, it has always been a source of bewilderment to this reviewer why some enterprising lyricist hadn't used these Brahms melodies.

None of the four movements can be justifiably called "slow" in spite of the second being marked "adagio." The interpretation Dr. Koussevitsky offered listeners Saturday night was outstandingly successful for the pastoral inspirations the composer felt and wrote were played in surroundings wholly compatible. The vivaciousness and splendid power of the finale brought the audience to their feet at its conclusion and the thundrous din of applause many minutes. This was a fitting tribute to those who had offered another outstanding program of the world's best music.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

AUG 5 - 1946

Berkshire Festival Concerts Attract Audience of 28,000

By Staff Correspondent

LENOX, Aug. 5.—The second of the three series of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky opened last Thursday night at Tanglewood with the smallest audience in attendance to date, about seven thousand. The succeeding two events on Saturday night and Sunday afternoon increased the weekend total to twenty-eight thousand auditors.

The three concerts were devoted entirely to the music of Johannes Brahms, and featured as soloists Claudio Arrau, pianist; Carol ~~Brice, Negro~~ contralto; Erica Morini, violinist; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist.

The glamor of last week's opening concerts, with their brilliant attendance of world celebrities, appreciably subsided into greater concentration on musical offerings. The music of Brahms proved to be generally less exciting than the diversified programs of last week.

The high spot of Thursday night's concert was the "Concerto in D Minor," played by Arrau. The young Chilean pianist, who is remembered in Worcester for his Civic Music appearance of two seasons ago, was warmly received for his performance of the long, difficult work.

Carol Brice Scores

Carol Brice, newcomer to these scenes, received hearty welcome Saturday night for her participation in the "Rhapsody, Opus 53" in which she was assisted by a male chorus coached by Robert Shaw. Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky, who have both played in Worcester in recent years, were given an ovation for their joint performance in the "Concerto in A minor for Violin and Violincello."

Of the 400 students enrolled at the Berkshire Music Center eighty are from Massachusetts. Due to an error in recording Marcia Skeist's Worcester address at the Center, it was incorrectly reported last week that Worcester's only representative was Wayne Barrington, son of Mr and Mrs. Clarence Barrington of 31 Perkins street.

Miss Skeist, daughter of Mr and Mrs. Samuel Skeist of 44 Chandler street, was a prominent student violinist when she attended Classical High. She subsequently went to Syracuse University and then to the Eastman School where she received the degree of Bachelor of Music in 1945. She is at present a teacher of public school music at Kenmore, N. Y., a suburb of Buffalo.

Both Miss Skeist and Mr. Barrington were enrolled here after exacting auditions. Their purpose is to gain experience in orchestral and ensemble playing for prospective symphony orchestra positions in the future.

Opera Tomorrow

They describe the advantages here as unequalled anywhere in the world. They have four orchestral and four chamber music rehearsals each week, in addition to rehearsals for the opera "Peter Grimes," which is to be given its first American performance in Tanglewood's theater concert-hall tomorrow night.

Miss Skeist, who now plays the viola, and Mr. Barrington, horn student, are regularly playing under the batons of Leonard Bernstein, Sanley Chapple, and numerous gifted student conductors, all under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The past week's activities, apart from the regular concerts, have included chamber music, choral, and Music Center orchestral concerts. These events are open to the "Friends of the Berkshire Music Center." Others pay an admission which benefits the Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund.

At the annual Summer Members Night in the Berkshire Museum last Friday night, Dr. Koussevitzky declared the Berkshire Center Students' Orchestra to be on a par with the symphony orchestras of Cleveland or Cincinnati.

Said Koussevitzky, "At the end of the first week we were depressed by the orchestra. By the end of the third week, it was as good as Cleveland or Cincinnati."

Berkshire Music Festival

Perhaps it was a foregone conclusion that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky would score an outstanding success at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. The surpassing excellence of the orchestra and its conductor, which we take for granted here, had an electric effect on the audiences drawn from all sections of the country with foreign visitors no rarity.

Not quite as obvious but just as real is the influence that Dr. Koussevitzky has exercised on the careers of young artists who, but for him, might have remained in relative obscurity. Magnificent as are the contributions of the orchestra at Tanglewood, yet they do not take precedence over the achievements of the Berkshire Music School. It is as educator and inspiring genius of young talent that Dr. Koussevitzky will find his most enduring fame. The element of self is completely lacking when a great artist, from the secure heights of his own eminence, gives a helping hand to those found worthy. What this has meant to a Bernstein or a Foss we all know. What it will mean to the world of music is incalculable.

Jewish Advocate
Aug. 5

DAYTON, O.
HERALD

AUG 5 - 1946

ALICE HUGHES'

A Woman's New York

Jake crashed the social-musical circle of the Boston Symphony Berkshire Music festival last week. Snatched from his Pennsylvania pasture for a week end with Mama, he tussled with music, went to his own birthday party, and had an X-ray of his left foot to learn why why he is pigeon-toed. Tired, loaded with new toys, a tricycle and a flashlight, Jake is now back in Pennsy sleeping it off with Mike O'Neill, who did a little celebrating of his own. Both boys reached their second milestone on the same day. Mike's comment was, "It's dangerous," and Jake gave out with a terse "Gee whiz!"

Alice Hughes

At the morning rehearsal of the Boston Symphony as it readied the band for Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Spring," Jake kept his bright brown eyes on Conductor Koussevitzky, who wears one of those dramatic tweed Inverness capes. Our young novitiate to music sang along as the men in the orchestra played "Happy Birthday" for Koussy. He had a birthday, too, but it didn't make him any more polite than usual to his men. We distinctly heard him sputter, "Don't give me any of those Pop's Pizzicatos," and once when the second violins irked him, he hissed "You steeenk."

If mothers who read this column won't attack me, I'll confess I kept Jake up till 11 p. m. on his birthday. He was the only child present, and the dozen-and-a-half guests were all adult friends who came to pay their respects. Ferdinand Reyher, the writer, and Zaro Mostel, the comic; Tom Craven the art critic and his pretty wife from Paramount Pictures, Aileen Brennon, Weegie, crack photographer whose book "The Naked City" makes other photogs envious and chanteuse Hildegarde, happening to be in town for a day, popped in to sing Jake her theme song, "Darling, Je Vous Aime Beaucoup."

In spite of the culture soaked up at the Berkshire musical oasis of the Boston Brahmins, and notwithstanding the full-hearted joy of a family reunion, the best experience the youngster has had this summer is having a companion his own age. Jake's taken a few beatings from Mike and has given a few. But with each bump and scratch, he's learning how to cope with this mad, wonderful world.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

AUG 5 - 1946

Berkshire Society Turns Out for Even

Lenox, Aug. 4—An audience o 11,500, the largest so far this seasor acclaimed the Boston Symphony orchestra and its peerless conductor Dr Serge Koussevitzky, this afternoor at the concluding concert of the second series in the Berkshire Musi festival. This made a total of 30,00 for the series and a grand total o 59,500 for the six concerts, with three more to go starting Thursday night So far as weather is concerned it was a perfect midsummer afternoon and the widespread lawns had 500 stretched out almost to the administration building regardless of a boiling sun. The all-time record attendance at Tanglewood was 14,000 in the early stages of the war for a Russian benefit.

It was announced at the box office that all seats have been engaged for the three performances of Benjamin Britten's new opera, "Peter Grimes," starting Tuesday night with repetitions Wednesday and Friday nights.

This is the final week of the 1946 Tanglewood Music center program and days and nights will be crowded starting tomorrow with a chamber music and choral concert at 4.30 p. m. and followed at 8.15 with a "Peter Grimes" full rehearsal.

Great Enthusiasm

The enthusiasm for this afternoon's Brahms concert with Erica Morini, violin and Gregor Piatigorsky with his 250-year-old cello as soloists never has been exceeded at Tanglewood. Boston society and former members of European royalty were well represented.

Noticed with Mr and Mrs John Shepard, Jr., were Princess Eugenia Ruspoli and Prince and Princess Alexis Droutzkoy of Rome and New York; also Mr and Mrs Ernest E. Howes of Boston.

With Mrs Gordon Dexter (Isabella Hunnewell) who has Mrs William Marshall Bullitt's house at Stockbridge for the summer, were Countess Carsteja, Mrs C. Oliver Iselin, and Mrs George C. Clement.

In a group from the Lenox club were Mr and Mrs Andrew Hopewel Hepburn of Concord, Mr and Mrs Thomas N. Metcalf, Mr and Mrs Edward A. Taft. From the Curtis hote were Philip R. Allen, a trustee o the Boston Symphony orchestra and Mrs Allen of Walpole, Mr and Mrs Milton J. Warner of Pine Orchard, Ct. and the Mountain Lake club, Fla.

Mrs Henry K. White of Chestnu hill was with her parents, Mr and Mrs Samuel Gilbert Colt.

Mr and Mrs William Felton Barrett had as box guests John Alden Carpenter, the composer; Mrs Carpenter, Chicago; Countess Giovann Cardelli, Jr., Mrs Donald F. McPherson and Mrs Kingsley Porter.

Noticed with Mr and Mrs Alber Spalding were Mr and Mrs Phili Hoeffler.

In the box with Mr and Mrs Heaton Ives Treadway were Mr and Mrs James Spalding and Mr and Mrs Benjamin Warfield. With Mrs Newbol Morris were Mr and Mrs Stephanus Van Cortlandt Morris and Andre A Beaumont, Jr., of Washington.

From the Red Lion inn group were Mrs Gammell Cross, Mr and Mrs Curtis B. Brooks and Mrs H. G. Curtis of Providence, R. I., Dr and Mrs William Darrach of Greenwich, Ct.; Mr and Mrs Ernest T. Vietor, New York.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 5 - 1946

Brahms Concert Attracts 11,500 at Tanglewood

Throng Is Season's Largest; 'Peter Grimes' Sold Out

By a Staff Correspondent

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., Aug. 4.—An audience of 11,500, the largest so far this season, acclaimed the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its peerless conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, this afternoon at the concluding concert of the second series in the Berkshire Music Festival. This made a total of 30,000 for the series and a grand total of 59,500 for the six concerts, with three more to go starting Thursday night.

It was a perfect midsummer afternoon, and the widespread lawns had 5,000 persons stretched out regardless of a boiling sun. The all-time record attendance at Tanglewood was 14,000 in the early stages of the war for a Russian benefit.

It was announced at the box office that all seats have been engaged for the three performances of Benjamin Britten's new opera "Peter Grimes," starting Tuesday night, with repetitions Wednesday and Friday nights.

Tickets to the three performances were given to the friends of the Berkshire Music Center and represent a sort of a "dividend." The opera will be presented in the theater concert hall, with seating capacity of 1,200.

This is the final week of the 1946 Tanglewood Music Center program, and days and nights will be crowded, starting tomorrow with a chamber music and choral concert at 4:30 o'clock and followed at 8:15 o'clock with a "Peter Grimes" full rehearsal. Britten, an Englishman, was commissioned by the orchestra trustees to compose "Peter Grimes."

The enthusiasm for this afternoon's Brahms concert with Erica Morini, violin, and Gregor Piatigorsky, cello, as soloists, never has been exceeded at Tanglewood.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

AUG 5 - 1946

KOUSSEVITZKY IS HEARD AT BEST

Boston Symphony Brahm's Evening at Tanglewood

By Evert C. Larson

A quiet, breezeless summer evening, in the heart of the ever beautiful Berkshire Hills, prevailed Saturday night when more than 10,000 summer-clad concert-goers filled Tanglewood's Shed and lawns to hear the second all-Brahms program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Highlighting the evening of music was the introduction to Tanglewood's audience the artistry of Carol Brice, who possesses a superlatively rich contralto voice with an astoundingly versatile range.

However, it appears to matter very little who is present on the stage in addition to Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, for the conductor's mannerisms have a hynotic quality that arrest listener's attention. Dr. Koussevitzky's appearance upon the podium is highly individualistic since he in no way resembles the "conservative" director whose chief movement is the rhythmic wave of a baton. The Boston Symphony's conducter holds a white, nine-inch baton that is secondary to his direction which involves his entire body.

Superb in Brahms

Brahms offers Dr. Koussevitzky the best in podium showmanship for Brahms wrote music eloquently; somber and moody as well as lyrical and boisterous. Those in the audience close to the stage, readily discerned the price Dr. Koussevitzky paid in nervous strain and fatigue as he wrenched from his talented musicians the interpretation he sought, demanded, and wasn't satisfied until he had received. Therefore the success of the Boston Symphony appears to lie in its director—genius and disciplinarian.

Biographers have written that Brahms was a very modest man. This personality characteristic is not carried over into his music for the second and third symphonies as well as his rhapsody for contralto and male chorus, express confidence. There is no wallowing in doubt, no stumbling, and no evasions.

"Symphony No. 3 in F Major," first on the Tanglewood program, opened with the fullness that is characteristic of Brahms, who believed music must not only be emotionally expressive, but it must also be perfect in form. The second movement, which features an ecclesiastic-like melody, was perfectly timed with the dimming of the day's light when evening's mantle of darkness enveloped the locale. It's poetic beauty may well be associated with the religious story of "The Sermon on the Mount."

Vibrant Fourth Movement

The beautiful third movement contain sone of the many folk-dance melodies Brahms so loved to fuse into his works, but it is the vibrant fourth movement that is filled with the tonal powers Brahms used in the finales of his four symphonies. It is here that the emotions are most affected as horns cry out triumphantly against the accelerated beating of drums and the listener is enraptured by the experience.

"Rhapsody for Contralto, Male Chorus and Orchestra," opus 53, based on three verses of a Goethe poem, was the work Carol Brice chose for her Tanglewood debut. The tonal qualities Miss Brice possesses are sung with such ease that the effect is exceptionally pleasureable. Singing the verses in German, an obstacle in itself, Miss Brice colored the poet's verses with a warm contralto, and as well entered the soprano range with a sustained clarity that was, aside from being a delightful surprise, a manifestation of her versatility. During the last of the three verses, Miss Brice was joined by the Festival Chorus, under the direction of Robert Shaw, which gave the rhapsody a maturity appropriate for the finale. The ovation given Miss Brice, Dr. Koussevitzky, chorus and orchestra was unexceptionally long and remained unabated while the artists were off-stage inbetween bows.

Hummable Melodies

Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major" has often been referred to as "that pretty symphony." And not without reason. It contains more hummable melodies than any other of the composer's four, and has less of the brooding associated with his others. During the recent vogue of adapting classical music to modern love lyrics, it has always been a source of bewilderment to this reviewer why some enterprising lyricist hadn't used these Brahms melodies.

None of the four movements can be justifiably called "slow" in spite of the second being marked "adagio." The interpretation Dr. Koussevitsky offered listeners Saturday night was outstandingly successful for the pastoral inspirations the composer felt and wrote were played in surroundings wholly compatible. The vivaciousness and splendid power of the finale brought the audience to their feat at its conclusion and the thundrous din of applause many minutes. This was a fitting tribute to those who had offered another outstanding program of the world's best music.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

AUG 5 - 1946

Berkshire Festival Concerts Attract Audience of 28,000

By Staff Correspondent

LENOX, Aug. 5.—The second of the three series of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky opened last Thursday night at Tanglewood with the smallest audience in attendance to date, about seven thousand. The succeeding two events on Saturday night and Sunday afternoon increased the weekend total to twenty-eight thousand auditors.

The three concerts were devoted entirely to the music of Johannes Brahms, and featured as soloists Claudio Arrau, pianist; Carol [redacted] contralto; Erica Morini, violinist; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist.

The glamor of last week's opening concerts, with their brilliant attendance of world celebrities, appreciably subsided into greater concentration on musical offerings. The music of Brahms proved to be generally less exciting than the diversified programs of last week.

The high spot of Thursday night's concert was the "Concerto in D Minor" played by Arrau. The young Chilean pianist, who is remembered in Worcester for his Civic Music appearance of two seasons ago, was warmly received for his performance of the long, difficult work.

Carol Brice Scores

Carol Brice, newcomer to these scenes, received hearty welcome Saturday night for her participation in the "Rhapsody, Opus 53" in which she was assisted by a male chorus coached by Robert Shaw. Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky, who have both played in Worcester in recent years, were given an ovation for their joint performance in the "Concerto in A minor for Violin and Violincello."

Of the 400 students enrolled at the Berkshire Music Center eighty are from Massachusetts. Due to an error in recording Marcia Skeist's Worcester address at the Center, it was incorrectly reported last week that Worcester's only representative was Wayne Barrington, son of Mr and Mrs. Clarence Barrington of 31 Perkins street.

Miss Skeist, daughter of Mr and Mrs. Samuel Skeist of 44 Chandler street, was a prominent student violinist when she attended Classical High. She subsequently went to Syracuse University and then to the Eastman School where she received the degree of Bachelor of Music in 1945. She is at present a teacher of public school music at Kenmore, N. Y., a suburb of Buffalo.

Both Miss Skeist and Mr. Barrington were enrolled here after exacting auditions. Their purpose is to gain experience in orchestral and ensemble playing for prospective symphony orchestra positions in the future.

Opera Tomorrow

They describe the advantages here as unequalled anywhere in the world. They have four orchestral and four chamber music rehearsals each week, in addition to rehearsals for the opera "Peter Grimes," which is to be given its first American performance in Tanglewood's theater concert-hall tomorrow night.

Miss Skeist, who now plays the viola, and Mr. Barrington, horn student, are regularly playing under the batons of Leonard Bernstein, Sanley Chapple, and numerous gifted student conductors, all under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The past week's activities, apart from the regular concerts, have included chamber music, choral, and Music Center orchestral concerts. These events are open to the "Friends of the Berkshire Music Center." Others pay an admission which benefits the Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund.

At the annual Summer Members Night in the Berkshire Museum last Friday night, Dr. Koussevitzky declared the Berkshire Center Students' Orchestra to be on a par with the symphony orchestras of Cleveland or Cincinnati.

Said Koussevitzky, "At the end of the first week we were depressed by the orchestra. By the end of the third week, it was as good as Cleveland or Cincinnati."

Berkshire Music Festival

Perhaps it was a foregone conclusion that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky would score an outstanding success at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. The surpassing excellence of the orchestra and its conductor, which we take for granted here, had an electric effect on the audiences drawn from all sections of the country with foreign visitors no rarity.

Not quite as obvious but just as real is the influence that Dr. Koussevitzky has exercised on the careers of young artists who, but for him, might have remained in relative obscurity. Magnificent as are the contributions of the orchestra at Tanglewood, yet they do not take precedence over the achievements of the Berkshire Music School. It is as educator and inspiring genius of young talent that Dr. Koussevitzky will find his most enduring fame. The element of self is completely lacking when a great artist, from the secure heights of his own eminence, gives a helping hand to those found worthy. What this has meant to a Bernstein or a Foss we all know. What it will mean to the world of music is incalculable.

Jewish Advocate
Aug. 5

ALICE HUGHES'

A Woman's New York

Jake crashed the social-musical circle of the Boston Symphony Berkshire Music festival last week. Snatched from his Pennsylvania pasture for a week end with Mama, he tussled with music, went to his own birthday party, and had an X-ray of his left foot to learn why why he is pigeon-toed. Tired, loaded with new toys, a tricycle and a flashlight, Jake is now back in Pennsy sleeping it off with Mike O'Neill, who did a little celebrating of his own. Both boys reached their second milestone on the same day. Mike's comment was, "It's dangerous," and Jake gave out with a terse "Gee whiz!"

Alice Hughes

At the morning rehearsal of the Boston Symphony as it readied the band for Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Spring," Jake kept his bright brown eyes on Conductor Koussevitzky, who wears one of those dramatic tweed Inverness capes. Our young novitiate to music sang along as the men in the orchestra played "Happy Birthday" for Koussy. He had a birthday, too, but it didn't make him any more polite than usual to his men. We distinctly heard him sputter, "Don't give me any of those Pop's Pizzicatos," and once when the second violins irked him, he hissed "You steeenk."

If mothers who read this column won't attack me, I'll confess I kept Jake up till 11 p. m. on his birthday. He was the only child present, and the dozen-and-a-half guests were all adult friends who came to pay their respects. Ferdinand Reyher, the writer, and Zaro Mostel, the comic; Tom Craven the art critic and his pretty wife from Paramount Pictures, Aileen Brennon, Weegie, crack photographer whose book "The Naked City" makes other photogs envious and chanteuse Hildegarde, happening to be in town for a day, popped in to sing Jake her theme song, "Darling, Je Vous Aime Beaucoup."

In spite of the culture soaked up at the Berkshire musical oasis of the Boston Brahmins, and notwithstanding the full-hearted joy of a family reunion, the best experience the youngster has had this summer is having a companion his own age. Jake's taken a few beatings from Mike and has given a few. But with each bump and scratch, he's learning how to cope with this mad, wonderful world.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

AUG 5 - 1946

Berkshire Society Turns Out for Even

Lenox, Aug. 4—An audience o 11,500, the largest so far this seasor acclaimed the Boston Symphony orchestra and its peerless conductor Dr Serge Koussevitzky this afternoon at the concluding concert of the second series in the Berkshire Music festival. This made a total of 30,000 for the series and a grand total o 59,500 for the six concerts, with three more to go starting Thursday night So far as weather is concerned it was a perfect midsummer afternoon and the widespread lawns had 5000 stretched out almost to the administration building regardless of a boiling sun. The all-time record attendance at Tanglewood was 14,000 in the early stages of the war for a Russian benefit.

It was announced at the box office that all seats have been engaged fo the three performances of Benjamin Britten's new opera, "Peter Grimes," starting Tuesday night with repetitions Wednesday and Friday nights.

This is the final week of the 1946 Tanglewood Music center program and days and nights will be crowded starting tomorrow with a chambe music and choral concert at 4.30 p. m. and followed at 8.15 with a "Peter Grimes" full rehearsal.

Great Enthusiasm

The enthusiasm for this afternoon's Brahms concert with Erica Morini, violin and Gregor Piatigorsky with his 250-year-old cello as soloists never has been exceeded at Tanglewood. Boston society and former members of European royalty were well represented.

Noticed with Mr and Mrs John Shepard, Jr., were Princess Eugenia Ruspoli and Prince and Princess Alexis Droutzkoy of Rome and New York; also Mr and Mrs Ernest E. Howes of Boston.

With Mrs Gordon Dexter (Isabella Hunnewell) who has Mrs William Marshall Bullitt's house at Stockbridge for the summer, were Countess Carsteja, Mrs C. Oliver Iselin, and Mrs George C. Clement.

In a group from the Lenox clul were Mr and Mrs Andrew Hopewel Hepburn of Concord, Mr and Mrs Thomas N. Metcalf, Mr and Mrs Edward A. Taft. From the Curtis hote were Philip R. Allen, a trustee o the Boston Symphony orchestra and Mrs Allen of Walpole, Mr and Mrs Milton J. Warner of Pine Orchard, Ct. and the Mountain Lake club, Fla.

Mrs Henry K. White of Chestnut hill was with her parents, Mr and Mrs Samuel Gilbert Colt.

Mr and Mrs William Felton Barrett had as box guests John Alden Carpenter, the composer; Mrs Carpenter, Chicago; Countess Giovann Cardelli, Jr., Mrs Donald F. McPherson and Mrs Kingsley Porter.

Noticed with Mr and Mrs Alber Spalding were Mr and Mrs Philip Hoeffler.

In the box with Mr and Mrs Heaton Ives Treadway were Mr and Mrs James Spalding and Mr and Mrs Benjamin Warfield. With Mrs Newbold Morris were Mr and Mrs Stephanus Van Cortlandt Morris and Andre A Beaumont, Jr., of Washington.

From the Red Lion inn group were Mrs Gammell Cross, Mr and Mrs Curtis B. Brooks and Mrs H. G. Curtis of Providence, R. I., Dr and Mrs William Darrach of Greenwich, Ct.; Mr and Mrs Ernest T. Vietor, New York.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 5 - 1946

Brahms Concert Attracts 11,500 at Tanglewood

Throng Is Season's Largest; 'Peter Grimes' Sold Out

By a Staff Correspondent

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. Aug. 4.—An audience of 11,500 the largest so far this season, acclaimed the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its peerless conductor Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, this afternoon at the concluding concert of the second series in the Berkshire Music Festival. This made a total of 30,000 for the series and a grand total of 59,500 for the six concerts, with three more to go starting Thursday night.

It was a perfect midsummer afternoon, and the widespread lawns had 5,000 persons stretched out regardless of a boiling sun. The all-time record attendance at Tanglewood was 14,000 in the early stages of the war for a Russian benefit.

It was announced at the box office that all seats have been engaged for the three performances of Benjamin Britten's new opera "Peter Grimes," starting Tuesday night, with repetitions Wednesday and Friday nights.

Tickets to the three performances were given to the friends of the Berkshire Music Center and represent a sort of a "dividend." The opera will be presented in the theater concert hall, with seating capacity of 1,200.

This is the final week of the 1946 Tanglewood Music Center program, and days and nights will be crowded, starting tomorrow with a chamber music and choral concert at 4:30 o'clock and followed at 8:15 o'clock with a "Peter Grimes" full rehearsal. Britten, an Englishman, was commissioned by the orchestra trustees to compose "Peter Grimes."

The enthusiasm for this afternoon's Brahms concert with Erica Morini, violin, and Gregor Piatigorsky, cello, as soloists, never has been exceeded at Tanglewood.

[236]

Pittsfield, Massachusetts. Monday, August 5, 1946.

Crowds of 11,500 and 9500 Hear

Wonderfully Played Music Thrills Overflow Audiences

Dr. Koussevitzky Scores Personal Triumph in Direction of Three Symphonies; Soloists Live Up to Reputations

The crowd extended well onto the Tanglewood lawns where music lovers sat on camp stools, lounged on blankets and enjoyed the program as they basked in the Berkshire sun.

Contenta

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

With the final C major chord of the Brahms first symphony Serge Koussevitzky, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood, brought to a close the three-concert Brahms cycle and the middle third of the three-week Ninth Berkshire Festival. The final two concerts yesterday and Saturday evening, maintaining the high excitement of the first concert on Thursday evening, had been filled with wonderfully played music and thrilling moments. Some 21,000 persons heard the two concerts, 11,500 yesterday and 9500 Saturday night.

The fourth symphony had been heard on the first program. The other three were listed on these closing concerts; the middle two on Saturday evening, and the first to close yesterday's program. Each of the great symphonies merited a whole article in the report of their performance, and to have thus to scramble all three is unjust to the orchestra and to the man who wrought the ensemble which is Boston's and Berkshire's (summer) pride. Granting that on these last two occasions, Dr. Koussevitzky, with his choice of the Brahms symphonies, had no mean exordium, yet what he has woven and colored is his personal triumph. The texture of such instances as the slow movement of the third symphony doesn't just come out, from a Topsy-like orchestra loom; the bouquet of the first movement of the D major symphony just doesn't accrete by aging in the wood. A gardener tending the fabulous lawns outside the Temple in London once answered our question about how to cultivate such velvety greens by saying that it's easy with careful attention for about 200 years. Dr. Koussevitzky has not worked on his Brahms and his orchestra for quite that long, but in the quarter-century of collaboration with his unmatched personnel, they together have refined and reshaped, and polished every detail until the product of that intense application becomes an ever-recurring miracle at each repetition.

To mention any is to seem to slight the rest, but the woodwind in the andante of the F major symphony was far too superbly fastidious to pass over, just as was the cello in the statement of the adagio of the D major. And the spacious pace of the warm D major opening movement permitted an orchestral tone which cannot be forgotten.

Carol Brice Meets Challenge

When Carol Brice appeared in recital in Pittsfield last year, she gave ample testimony of her ability to do dramatic and more vocally spectacular things, so that her solo in the contralto rhapsody served to display another side of her fine musicianship. Here Brahms, writing on some somber and depressed verses of Goethe, follows the poet's spirit with thorough fidelity but, in so doing, gives scant opportunity of ostentation to the voice. Miss Brice, however, met the challenge with sincere artistry and deeply-voiced vocal opulence. The full and steady emission of her splendidly-prepared voice, in its full range, was effectively sonorous everywhere, especially over the marvelously restrained accompaniment provided by the orchestra at the sensitive behest of their leader. The male chorus of some 70 voices, trained by the Berkshire Music Center's Robert Shaw, performed with impressive discipline. Brahms' sense of cumulative timing and Koussevitzky's feeling, here conspicuously, for the impact of understatement, made of this usually less than thrilling opus an intensely absorbing experience. Miss Brice sustained her tones with easy dominance, and expressed her verses both in her copiously full low resonances and in the higher registers with completely heartfelt emotional immersion. The whole performance was a rare example of artistic unification. It was only the desire to accommodate an unseen radio audience that prompted those responsible to work the lights so that they discouraged further exhibition of enthusiasm, for the tremendous audience would fain have shown their deeply-felt approval for Miss Brice, as well as for Dr. Koussevitzky and for the chorus-director, Mr. Shaw, who was graciously called to the front of the stage to share the applause.

Yesterday's Program

Yesterday's program began with the variations on a theme of Haydn, a lovable and comparatively uncomplicated piece, and was followed by the double concerto, in which Erica Morini was solo violinist and Gregor Piatigorsky, solo cellist. These are two such sterling artists that anything they attempt is sure to be impressive. Yesterday they played true to form, and made the concerto interesting even when they were not in agreement. Each soloist made the most of his individual opportunities, and there were many instances of beautiful playing, of which outstanding examples were Mr. Piatigorsky's introductory recitativo and Miss Morini's rendition of the plaintive repetition of the second subject (in A major).

Probably the climax of the whole Brahms cycle's excitement was reserved for the performance of the first symphony with which yesterday afternoon's concert ended. The tempo of each movement was so just and happy, and the microscopic details so beautifully accomplished, and the whole conception so full of imagination, it was no wonder that the record audience

At Tanglewood Today and Tomorrow

Today

*4.30—Department 5 Chamber Music and Choral Concert.

Tuesday

*8.15—First performance of "Peter Grimes." (All seats reserved).

*Open to Friends of Berkshire Music Center.

City Edition

Final Brahms Concerts

Part of the overflow crowd of 11,500 persons who attended yesterday's concert at Tanglewood may be seen sitting at the edge of the colonnade listening to strains of the Boston Symphony.

Conten

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 5 - 1946

Audience of 11,500 Hears Final Brahms Program

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Aug. 4.—The trilogy of Brahms programs, which comprised the second of three series of Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood, was brought to a close this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, and guest artists Erica Morini, violinist, and Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist. There was an audience of 11,500.

This series has realistically brought home the fact that a series of even three concerts of Brahms is digestible diet for the musicologist, interested student and confirmed Brahmsian. For the average occupant of a concert seat, it provides an unlimited series of emotional experiences and a number of question marks.

No. 1 Most Gripping

All four of the Brahms symphonies have been played. Are we to judge, because Koussevitzky programmed them in reverse order that Brahms decreased as a symphonist as he grew older? It isn't important, but it is significant that today's performance of the "Symphony No. 1, in C Minor, Opus 68" was, by far, the most gripping of the quartet.

Those who have heard this great work under Koussevitzky's baton have sensed a wonderful experience in human strife, intensity and those other driving impulses that are unleashed by a few works like the Beethoven "Fifth Symphony" and the "Ninth."

The opening chord in C minor, which established a dramatic tension by its ever-mounting power, was the keynote of a performance of this, the greatest of Brahms orchestra works.

Soloists Superb

The soloists should be neglected no longer. The "Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, Opus 102", which Morini and Piatigorsky played, is reputably Brahms' last orchestral venture. Be that as it may, it is a statuesque work from an orchestral standpoint, and disproves Brahms lack of confidence in the handling of solo instruments.

In Erica Morini you have a violinist who plays with the Bravura and assertion of a man and the sensitivity of a woman. In Piatigorsky, you have a giant of the 'cello-an artist to whom the instrument is not only the deep voice of the strings, but capable of great virtuosity as well, the combination was thrilling to hear.

An Artistic Feast

This wasn't the greatest music for violin and 'cello, but even if it had been a sow's ear it probably would have turned into a silk purse. There is no necessity to analyze the works three movements—I'll leave that to the compilers of program notes—but it should be recorded that from the standpoint of sheer artistry, this afternoon's audience feasted well.

The program's remaining work was "Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Opus 102", which were beautifully played.

Next weekend unfortunately will silence these beautiful concerts. The soloists will include Gregor Piatigorsky and Mischa Elman. Again they will be given Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

AUG 5 - 1946

RANDOM THOUGHTS AT TANGLEWOOD

By IRVING KOLODIN.
Special to THE NEW YORK SUN.

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 5.—Experienced visitors to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood are both warned and reassured by a siren which can be heard about twenty minutes before each concert, they have now discovered. This is no official signal of anything, merely the prowl car of the Massachusetts State police escorting to the grounds the car in which rides conductor Serge Koussevitzky. Whether the howling is something sanctioned by Koussevitzky, one cannot say; however, it serves to warn those who are parking cars that the magic hour is at hand, but also, that the conductor is no nearer the audience than they are.

You could wander all over the many acres of lawns and gardens on these sloping shores of Stockbridge Bowl (local name for the lake the Indians called Mahkeen-qh-ic-something-or-other) and never notice, except by accident, the official signs which identify the place. By such an accident, I noticed the other evening, on two huge trees flanking the main drive (which leads into an area in which at least a thousand cars were parked) two signboards about the size of a New York street marker. Modestly, briefly, each read, merely: "Tanglewood."

The name for it these days is probably different, but the celebrated New England custom of "bundling" still flourishes hereabouts. The hint of chill in the air last night was hardly strong enough for any one to take, save those couples in the overflow who were huddled on the lawn. Many, with forethought, had brought blankets; those without them "bundled" quite successfully, reminding one that the least important thing in "bundling" is the blanket.

A magnificent performance of the F major symphony (No.3) was a prime experience of the Brahms week which concluded yesterday afternoon with Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky playing the "Double" concerto. One of the elements which distinguished the symphony was the rich mellowness of the Boston's horn quartet. Closer scrutiny revealed, however, that the "quartet" was really eight men. Since the orchestra carries eight superb horn players on its pay roll, Koussevitzky utilized all of them, playing in relays, so that this trickiest of orchestral instruments was always manned by a fresh pair of players. The chief hornist, W. Valkenier, sat in almost silent reverie till the famous solo passage arrived in the third movement; then he put the instrument to his lips, blew superbly for a half minute or so, and retired again to his reverie.

When Carol Brice was growing up in Sedalia, N. C., she hoped for nothing more glamorous than a career as a music teacher. Those who heard the young Negro contralto deliver the solo part in Brahms' "Alto Rhapsody" for orchestra, chorus and solo voice know that she has the voice to carry her as far as she wants to go. She is not yet a polished singer; but the good grain will glow, given the necessary physical application.

Tonight: A dress rehearsal of Benjamin Brittan's "Peter Grimes," which will have its American premiere tomorrow evening. An alternate cast will sing the leading roles of the opera at the final run-through. However, the conductor will have no respite. Leonard Bernstein will conduct not only the dress-rehearsal and the premiere, but the subsequent performances as well.

MONDAY, AUGUST 5, 1946

DOUBLE CONCERTO ENDS BRAHMS CONCERT SERIES

Berkshire Festival

Yesterday afternoon at the Shed, Tanglewood, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erica Morini and Gregor Piatrigorsky, presented the following program of music by Brahms:
Variation on a Theme by Haydn
Concerto in A minor for Violin and Cello

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

TANGLEWOOD, Aug. 4 — The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky concluded a festival within a festival this afternoon when they gave the third of a series of Brahms concerts marking the second week of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. A huge crowd was on hand to hear and applaud Erica Morini, violinist, and Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, in Brahms' rarely heard Double Concerto in A Minor. The program opened with the Variations on a theme by Haydn and closed with the familiar and still glorious First Symphony, a work which had the audience shouting bravoes today at the final chord. And that means noise, as the official count of today's audience was 11,500.

Mr. Koussevitzky's Brahms festival this year has nicely bridged the master's better known music with that which is seldom heard nowadays. Thus all four symphonies were given, but also the Rhapsody for the contralto male chorus and orchestra, which was given last night, and today's Double Concerto. This concerto for violin, cello and orchestra was Brahms' last orchestral work and has had some of his admirers stumped ever since. Even so recent a biographer as Walter Niemann was perplexed by it and rather shrugged it off. The late Sir Donald Tovey, however, was a vigorous champion of it and proclaimed it to be one of the very finest of Brahms' orchestral compositions.

DIFFICULT TECHNIQUE

I imagine that it is so rarely performed by reason of the great difficulty that the two soloists have to surmount in order to achieve a performance that must be so closely welded in technique and in spirit that it sounds as one instrument. Then too the soloists must always be managed, as it were, by the orchestra and the conductor, for the concerto is not a virtuoso piece for two soloists with accompaniment, but a symphonic piece first and last, even more so than Brahms' Violin Concerto. It is magnificent music of the subtlest workmanship, and yet for all its architecture it is emotionally as lovely and simple a piece as Brahms ever wrote.

Let us hope that Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will see fit to give us the Concerto in Symphony Hall next season with the same soloists. Fine as Miss Morini and Mr. Piatigorsky were this afternoon, I am sure that they would be even better in subsequent performances. So difficult must be the task of rehearsal, even for such accomplished artists as these, that further work together and with the orchestra would not make the music appear stale. Rather would more details be appreciated and more beauties disclosed. This is not to say that today's performance was not an excellent one, but I felt that it was more Koussevitzky's triumph in dominating and co-ordinating the interpretation, and perhaps after all that is as it should be.

The rest of the program was all tried and trusted material. The Haydn Variations are always a delight to the musician for the astonishing way in which Brahms plays with the theme. The First Symphony sounded exceptionally eloquent, and the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzy fully deserved the thunderous applause. The weather obligingly reformed itself after Thursday's rain so that the state audience had a perfect summer day for the concert. Those of us who are staying up here are now looking forward to the first American performance of Benjamin Britton's opera, "Peter Grimes," which takes place Tuesday night.

Aug 5

'Peter Grimes' Tomorrow Night at 8.30

Opera Premiere By Invitation; Busy Week

With the first Western Hemisphere performance of the opera, "Peter Grimes," scheduled for tomorrow night, the Berkshire Music Center entered today upon its last and busiest week. Sixteen musical events will be open to Friends of the Center and the public within the next seven days. Benjamin Britten, author of "Peter Grimes," arrived last week from England.

Benjamin Britten

There will be a full dress rehearsal of "Peter Grimes" at 8 tonight with the opening of the opera tomorrow evening at 8.15.

Opera scenes by the opera workshop are scheduled for Wednesday afternoon at 3.30, Thursday at 3.30 and Saturday at 2.30 in the formal garden if weather permits; in the chamber music hall if it is wet. On Wednesday and Friday evenings "Peter Grimes" will be repeated.

On Thursday afternoon at 4.30 Department 5 orchestra will give a symphony concert and on Friday at 2.15 Department 2 orchestra will play. Olin Downes, New York Times music editor, will give the last of four lectures on "The Art of Criticism" Friday at 4.30. The last event by students of the school will be a chamber music concert by Department 2 Sunday morning at 10.30.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the final series of concerts of the Berkshire Festival Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, and in a public rehearsal for the benefit of the pension fund Saturday morning at 10.

More than 1000 persons heard the student concerts over the week end. Trinity Church in Lenox was packed to the doors Saturday afternoon when the choral group sang under the direction of Robert Shaw. Sunday morning an overflow audience heard Piatigorsky's chamber music group in two Brahms quintets, and last evening, in the small hall many guests listened to a program of chamber music by six Latin-American composers studying at the school.

Those who wish to attend student events may secure tickets by voluntary contributions entitling them to membership in the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

PORTCHESTER, N. Y.
ITEM

AUG 6 - 1946

[illegible] Tale of [illegible]wood," by M. A. De Wolfe Howe. Midway in the season of the Berkshire Music Festival is perhaps the ideal time to read about this famous symphonic festival which is presented in the midsummer season under the inspired direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

AUG 5 - 1946

Rhythm and Reason

Record Crowd at Tanglewood Hear Morini and Piatigorsky

By Harriett Johnson

Lenox, Aug. 5—A GI in a taxi on Saturday night gave us the keynote to the real significance of the Berkshire Festival. He was an overgrown blond Pfc. who was in the car we hailed to take us to Tanglewood for the second concert in the Brahms Series. He proved to be a trusting soul as well as a music lover . . . He had no room for the night, no tickets for the concerts and had just arrived at eight P. M. from Fort Dix. (Concert at 8:15 p. m.).

"Who's performing tonight?" he asked. When informed that it was Carol Brice, young Negro contralto, singing Brahms alto rhapsody with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plus the second and third symphonies, his answer was, "Gee, that's swell."

Over the week-end thousands with the same idea had a similar impulse. Few came from so far on split-minute timing, but for both concerts of the Boston Symphony with Maestro Serge Koussevitzky conducting (Saturday night and yesterday afternoon), the shed seating 6000 was sold out and the surrounding lawn decorated with enthusiasts.

Lesson in Contentment

Miss Brice, gifted with one of the deepest contraltos now in the concert field, has a solemnity in her voice which the rhapsody needs. In the lower register besides richness it has a straightforward, solid texture. She sang the music with a sincerity which was moving and the orchestra provided a beautiful accompaniment. Her upper register is not so lovely as the middle and low voice. The quality tends to be hollow and hard. She is also inclined toward a percussive attack.

Yesterday's concert with Erica Morini, violinist, and Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, performing the double concerto for violin and cello, plus the orchestra and Koussevitzky playing the "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" and the first Symphony in C Minor, benefited from a warm day accompanied by sunshine. The performance of the concerto found soloists, conductor and ensemble in harmonious accord as regards tempo, dynamics and the other facets of a performance. Fortunately, both Morini and Piatigorsky have a luscious tone which together with the beauty of the ensembles' sound was just as good as a lesson in the philosophy of contentment. For the moment it was difficult to imagine a chaotic world.

The atmosphere of Tanglewood is bursting with musical reality but it's undoubtedly one of the best places in the world during festival time to forget any troubles, superficial and otherwise. On Saturday I sat for two hours, combining a sunbath with listening to a rehearsal of the music to be played that night and the next. In the afternoon I heard Bob Shaw's chorus perform the Magnificat of Bach in Trinity Church in Lenox. The performance was notable for exciting ensemble singing and revealing a beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, owned, according to the program, by Marjorie Stormont.

Preceding the Bach work, a women's chorus under the direction of young Shaw but conducted by a young lady conductor (and good she was, too), Lorna de Varon, sang the "Litanies a la Vierge Noire," by the French composer Francois Poulenc.

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

AUG 5 - 1946

Attends Berkshire Music Festival

Cooperstown — Mrs. Dorothea Forman spent the weekend in Lenox, Mass., attending the Berkshire Music Festival. She will be joined there by her daughter, Miss Joyce Forman, New York City, who will accompany her mother home for her annual vacation. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Colby, Akron, Ohio, arrived yesterday to spend their vacation with Mrs. Colby's mother, in her apartment at "The Boulders," on Otsego Lake.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

AUG 6

Tanglewood To Present 'PeterGrimes'

The opera "Peter Grimes" will be presented for the first time in the Western Hemisphere tonight at Tanglewood by the Berkshire Music Center, starting the center off on its last and most active week of the season.

Within the next six days, 1[illegible] events will be offered, opera scenes by the Opera Workshop at 3:30 p. m. tomorrow and Thursday and at 2:30 p. m. Saturday, repeated performances of the opera by Benjamin Britten tomorrow and Friday evenings, symphony concert by Department 5 orchestra at 4:30 p. m. Thursday, concert by Department 2 orchestra at 2:15 p. m. Friday, "Art of Criticism" lecture by Olin Downes at 4:30 p. m. Friday and chamber music concert by Department 2 group at 10:30 a. m. Sunday.

The final series of festival concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be Thursday and Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoon, with a public rehearsal for the pension fund at 10 a. m. Saturday. General admissions to the grounds will go on sale three hours before each concert.

Globe Aug 5

The Pops Programs

To the Editor—Being a newspaperman, I am not addicted to writing letters to the editor; but I could not refrain from complimenting Charles E. Tankel for his remarks regarding the Pops programs of the past season. I join with him in hoping that next year will see the return to "good" music at the Pops. Heaven knows we have enough of the other junk on the radio 365 days a year.

EDWARD L. McDONOUGH.
Lynn Telegram-News.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

AUG 5 - 1946

Music

Brahms Concert Touches Perfection

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5.—To date, the best performance of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, the best all around, that is, was the ruddy-faced Serge Koussevitzky's and his Boston Symphony's account of the First Brahms Symphony. I do not believe I have ever heard this orchestra, which is far from always a Brahms orchestra, do such a perfect job on this work, as it did yesterday afternoon.

And how does one describe perfection? Is it enough to say that a celebrated band played out of its head, that there was no spot that these ears could catch on the surgical purity of the rendering, no technical flaw in the sound, no fall from grace anywhere in the pitch?

And having said it, how could that compare with the articulate speech of the music itself, made so crystal-clear, so convincing and so forceful in the musical oratory that was eloquent enough to earn a noisy ovation, stamping, applause, cheers and waving and throwing about of arms and hands by as sophisticated an audience as can be got together on this side of the Atlantic?

The program had begun with the Brahms-Haydn Variation, and continued with the Concerto for Violin, 'Cello and Orchestra in A Minor, Op. 102, presenting Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky as the respective soloists.

A slight fog, which had for some morning hours settled over the Berkshires, receded gradually, but it left enough of its humid influence to wreak injustices on the tonal quality of both soloists' strings. Miss Morini's tone appeared thin at the beginning and Mr. Piatigorsky's muffled. Later, though, matters improved, somewhat.

Yet there was no end of musicianly refinement in their achievement. They played as one, indulging in a shiny, all-purposeful give-and-take between themselves, separately and with the orchestra. It was not for nothing that the piece had been so assiduously rehearsed on Saturday morning, and the results showed only too patently what hours of study are for.

However, for all the care exercised by soloists, conductor and ensemble in that composition, for all the sensitive loveliness of the lyrical passages, for all the bright, sharply etched delivery of the earlier Brahms-Haydn, it was in the Symphony that the most noble music was made. It was plain to this listener and, making a pretty safe guess, all others present that we had all undergone an experience not only spiritually and musically satisfying, but also exciting as the dickens.

For the previous evening (Saturday) Dr. Koussevitzky had scheduled two symphonies, the Second and Third, in this Brahms festival within a Festival, besides the Alto Rhapsody with Carol Brice, as the soloist, and the Festival Chorus trained by the remarkably gifted Robert Shaw.

Miss Brice, a serious and completely unaffected singer, proved generally an able Brahmin in the music set to melancholy and prayerful lines from Goethe's "Harzreise in Winter." Further, in the middle and lower registers of her rich voice, she accomplished many a gem of poetic phrasing in appropriately brooding tones. It was up above, though, that she went either slightly shrill or a-fading, neither of which tendency was manifested often enough to disturb very much the fluid syntax of Brahms.

Of the two symphonies, the Second was the better done by far. It was again the Boston Symphony in high fettle and spirits doing justice to a work this time almost too generously supplied with song. But nothing to compare with yesterday's First. That was a performance of performances!

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 6 - 1946

CAST PREPARES 'PETER GRIMES' AT TANGLEWOOD

Western Hemisphere Premiere of Englishman's Opera Is Scheduled Tonight

Lenox, Aug. 6—With the first western-hemisphere performance of Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," scheduled tonight, the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood has ntered upon its last and busiest week. Fourteen events will be open o friends of the center and the public within the next six days.

Opera scenes by the opera workshop are planned for tomorrow and Thursday afternoons at 3.30 and Saturday at 2.30. They will be presented in the formal garden if weather permits, in the chamber music hall, if the garden is wet. Tomorrow and Friday evenings "Peter Grimes" will be repeated.

Thursday afternoon at 4.30, department five orchestra will give a symphony concert and on Friday at .15, department two orchestra will play. Olin Downes, New York Times music critic, will give the last of four lectures on "The art of criticism" Friday at 4.30. The last event by students of the school will be a chamber music concert by department two group Sunday morning at 0.30.

Seats are available for the final series of festival concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, and for a public rehearsal for the benefit of the pension fund Saturday morning at 10. Three hours before each concert the box office will sell admissions to the grounds, from which 11,000 heard the [illegible] over the past weekend.

Tanglewood Tale

As sunset deepened into dusk last Thursday evening, July 25, long lines of automobiles inched their way over the hills which lead into Lenox, Mass. Twelve state policemen, helped by sixteen of Lenox's own finest, kept the traffic moving to its common crossroads. A passing truck driver might have wondered what the procession was all about, but the Berkshire countryside knew very well. For the first time since 1941, the Berkshire Festival was on again.

Out at Tanglewood,* the lodestar of it all, there was something doing musically for every taste and for anyone who had a car, could hire a taxi, or hitch a ride. Just finished was a Bach-Mozart series for the discriminating, played by the top-flight men of the Boston Symphony. Ahead, on Aug. 6, was the American première of the opera "Peter Grimes," the 1945 product of the gifted young Englishman, Benjamin Britten (NEWSWEEK, June 18, 1945).

And just now were the big festival concerts, performed by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, kingpin of the whole enterprise. Although the repertoire is too often on the obvious side, the charm of these concerts lies in the mixture of the near-perfection of the Boston Symphony with equal parts of nature in the form of rolling mountains, rustling trees, and spreading lawns.

For the cause of music, however, the most important thing at Tanglewood is its school, which is called the Berkshire Music Center. Here, for six weeks, music students can get the finest solo and ensemble training in instrument, voice, and composition. Here, for example, the young conductor-composer Leonard Bernstein took some of his best lessons. This summer he is back again, still on the receiving end from men like Koussevitzky and Aaron Copland, but now, as the local boy who made good, also dishing out some advice of his own.

There exists the danger, of course, that the Berkshire Festival concerts, like Salzburg, will attract too many people who will go, not for the music, but because it is the thing to do. But so long as the school can, as Koussevitzky puts it, stimulate the students to seek "a wider access to inexhaustible treasures of musical art [and] a higher vision of music as a profession," Tanglewood will have lived up to its highest promise.

---

*An estate of more than 200 acres, so called because it was the setting of Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Tanglewood Tales." In 1936 the property was given to the Boston Symphony.

NEWSWEEK, AUGUST 5, 1946

Brahms Cycle Concludes Tanglewood Second Series

Special to The Hartford Times

Lenox, Mass. — Sunday afternoon's concert at Tanglewood concluded the second symphonic series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival and also Dr. Koussevitzky's Brahms cycle of three programs which comprised all four symphonies, two concertos, the Haydn Variations, the Alto Rhapsody and the Tragic Overture. The third and last series will be held Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon.

A reviewer whom custom seats at the most advantageous possible point is likely, in making his estimates, to be unregardful of the thousands of listeners who in fair weather pay a sizable sum to hear Tanglewood's music while relaxing on the beautifully kept lawns surrounding the music shed. For this reason I made it a point of hearing the C minor symphony from several outlying perspectives.

* * *

IT IS TRUE the music streams out into the open with remarkable clarity, even against an adverse breeze. The softer passages tend to fade out but not entirely so, provided there is no interfering conversation or tramping along the gravel paths. But there is astonishingly little of that. Apparently everybody comes to hear the music.

There is, of course, not absolute fidelity; nicety of detail washes out. There is quite a difference in the carrying power of the various instruments which sometimes puts the sound planes out of proportion. But I am convinced that many people do not trouble much about that. It is the atmosphere which matters most and this fabulous setting adds to the general enjoyment what technicalities never can supply. Perhaps we all use music for its background properties more than is realized.

* * *

TWO STERLING artists teamed their talents for the A minor, double Concerto, Violinist Erica Morini and Cellist Gregor Piatigorsky. Their styles were happily matched—aristocratic, zestful and warm-hearted.

Miss Morini's is scarcely an outdoor tone for it is anything but robust; her art is more exquisite. Yet her phrasing, while lacking intensity, managed to convey the essential Brahms locutions.

There is a good deal of statement and answer between the two solo instruments and I got the impression that Piatigorsky tempered his part in these colloquies, for his manner inclines to ruggedness. In the frequent unisons the two instruments produced an unforgettable texture.

The Haydn Variations were set forth by Dr. Koussevitsky with cannily differentiated moods and a pervading nobility.

* * *

CAROL BRICE was given a spontaneous and prolonged ovation Saturday night for her singing of the Alto Rhapsody. She is a statuesque figure with a certain artistic solemnity of bearing that is characteristic of her race. A natural, smoothly-textured contralto voice of no little power in the upper register is the gift which she used with impressive effect.

She had the vocal support of a male chorus trained by Robert Shaw whom Dr. Koussevitzky brought forward to share in the applause. His contribution was a choral element so nicely ordered as to nuance that it seemed to grow naturally out of the orchestral timbres.

The Rhapsody afforded a striking foil in separating the Third and the Second Symphonies. It is an anomalous burst of romanticism on the part of Classicist Brahms—not the gaudy romanticism of his contemporaries but a throwback to the Schubertian Weltschmerz of the Winter Journey song cycle.

* * *

ITS DARK subjectivism was thrown into high relief by Dr. Koussevitzky who drew from his orchestra in the very opening chords a sobbing quality of startling literalness.

The Symphonies in F and D are twin sisters in the numerous and congenial Brahms family. They are as closely akin in temperament as in tonality. Except for the adagio of the Second there is not a heavy mood in the entire eight movements, all together a contentedly smiling eclogue in so many cantos. This is the music of the plain philosopher, the walker through the woods and fields.

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY kept the music mellow and transparent, subdued excepting the irrestible opportunities for brass choirings, unspectacular until the finale of the D major Symphony which closed the concert with unprecedented brilliance.

But it was the Symphony in F which finished the first half of the concert with, for me, the profoundest effect. It is the very last pages of this Symphony for which all that goes before was made.

Brahms, often—very often—inspired, stood occasionally on the rim of apocalypse but never so near to complete disclosure as here. This seraphic music that sings of chalcedony and jasper, is not the product of a human mind. It was imparted to a mastercraftsman whose pen moved under dictate and what there is of terrestrial stuff in these measures says humbly: And I, John . . . in the isle that is called Patmos . . . saw these things and heard them.

C.E.L.

Surprise by Shostakovich

Aside from the reopening itself, the biggest attraction at last week's Berkshire Festival concert was the American première of Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony. (Its radio première is scheduled for Aug. 10.) After the completion of his Eighth in 1943, the Soviet composer had said that his Ninth would be a Victory Symphony, making up, with the Seventh and Eighth, a war trilogy.

Because it was written in the summer of 1945, after the European war was over, the Ninth which finally appeared could be called a Victory Symphony. Although Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an excellent performance, reflecting a high measure of devotion and preparation to the new work, the tone and style of the Ninth are not what would be expected of Shostakovich. The work is not a long, solemn, and triumphant paean. It is short (25 minutes), gay, exuberant, and even a little boisterous. It is also reminiscent of some of the composer's earlier efforts, like the simple First Symphony or the satiric "The Golden Age" ballet.

Shostakovich, like almost every other composer since Beethoven, confessed he was afraid of the implications of the number nine, and the inevitable comparisons to Beethoven's masterpiece. Perhaps, therefore, in writing so ungrandiose a work, he preferred to reverse his field and make comparisons impossible. Or could it be that Shostakovich, so faithful a musical mirror of his country's moods, is not even certain of his own future course?

AUG 5 – 19

Music

Brahms Concert Touches Perfection

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5.—To date, the best performance of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, the best all around, that is, was the ruddy-faced Serge Koussevitzky's and his Boston ~~Symphony~~'s account of the First Brahms Symphony. I do not believe I have ever heard this orchestra, which is far from always a Brahms orchestra, do such a perfect job on this work, as it did yesterday afternoon.

And how does one describe perfection? Is it enough to say that a celebrated band played out of its head, that there was no spot that these ears could catch on the surgical purity of the rendering, no technical flaw in the sound, no fall from grace anywhere in the pitch?

And having said it, how could that compare with the articulate speech of the music itself, made so crystal-clear, so convincing and so forceful in the musical oratory that was eloquent enough to earn a noisy ovation, stamping, applause, cheers and waving and throwing about of arms and hands by as sophisticated an audience as can be got together on this side of the Atlantic?

The program had begun with the Brahms-Haydn Variation, and continued with the Concerto for Violin, 'Cello and Orchestra in A Minor, Op. 102, presenting Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky as the respective soloists.

A slight fog, which had for some morning hours settled over the Berkshires, receded gradually, but it left enough of its humid influence to wreak injustices on the tonal quality of both soloists' strings. Miss Morini's tone appeared thin at the beginning and Mr. Piatigorsky's muffled. Later, though, matters improved, somewhat.

Yet there was no end of musicianly refinement in their achievement. They played as one, indulging in a shiny, all-purposeful give-and-take between themselves, separately and with the orchestra. It was not for nothing that the piece had been so assiduously rehearsed on Saturday morning, and the results showed only too patently what hours of study are for.

However, for all the care exercised by soloists, conductor and ensemble in that composition, for all the sensitive loveliness of the lyrical passages, for all the bright sharply etched delivery of the earlier Brahms-Haydn, it was in the Symphony that the most noble music was made. It was plain to this listener and, making a pretty safe guess, all others present that we had all undergone an experience not only spiritually and musically satisfying, but also exciting as the dickens.

For the previous evening (Saturday) Dr. Koussevitzky had scheduled two symphonies, the Second and Third, in this Brahms festival within a Festival, besides the Alto Rhapsody with Carol Brice, as the soloist, and the Festival Chorus trained by the remarkably gifted Robert Shaw.

Miss Brice, a serious and completely unaffected singer, proved generally an able Brahmin in the music set to melancholy and prayerful lines from Goethe's "Harzreise in Winter." Further in the middle and lower registers of her rich voice, she accomplished many a gem of poetic phrasing in appropriately brooding tones. It was up above, though, that she went either slightly shrill or a-fading, neither of which tendency was manifested often enough to disturb very much the fluid syntax of Brahms.

Of the two symphonies, the Second was the better done by far. It was again the Boston Symphony in high fettle and spirits doing justice to a work this time almost too generously supplied with song. But nothing to compare with yesterday's First. That was a performance of performances!

SPRINGFIELD, MASS. NEWS

AUG 6 – 1946

CAST PREPARES 'PETER GRIMES' AT TANGLEWOOD

Western Hemisphere Premiere of Englishman's Opera Is Scheduled Tonight

Lenox, Aug. 6—With the first western-hemisphere performance of Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," scheduled tonight, the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood has entered upon its last and busiest week. Fourteen events will be open to friends of the center and the public within the next six days.

Opera scenes by the opera workshop are planned for tomorrow and Thursday afternoons at 3.30 and Saturday at 2.30. They will be presented in the formal garden if weather permits, in the chamber music hall, if the garden is wet. Tomorrow and Friday evenings "Peter Grimes" will be repeated.

Thursday afternoon at 4.30, department five orchestra will give a symphony concert and on Friday at 2.15, department two orchestra will play. Olin Downes, New York Times music critic, will give the last of four lectures on "The art of criticism" Friday at 4.30. The last event by students of the school will be a chamber music concert by department two group Sunday morning at 10.30.

Seats are available for the final series of festival concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, and for a public rehearsal for the benefit of the pension fund Saturday morning at 10. Three [illegible] before each concert the box [illegible] will sell admissions to the [illegible] which 11,0[illegible] heard the [illegible] weekend.

Tanglewood Tale

As sunset deepened into dusk last Thursday evening, July 25, long lines of automobiles inched their way over the hills which lead into Lenox, Mass. Twelve state policemen, helped by sixteen of Lenox's own finest, kept the traffic moving to its common crossroads. A passing truck driver might have wondered what the procession was all about, but the Berkshire countryside knew very well. For the first time since 1941, the Berkshire Festival was on again.

Out at Tanglewood,* the lodestar of it all, there was something doing musically for every taste and for anyone who had a car, could hire a taxi, or hitch a ride. Just finished was a Bach-Mozart series for the discriminating, played by the top-flight men of the Boston Symphony. Ahead, on Aug. 6, was the American première of the opera "Peter Grimes," the 1945 product of the gifted young Englishman, Benjamin Britten (NEWSWEEK, June 18, 1945). And just now were the big festival concerts, performed by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, kingpin of the whole enterprise. Although the repertoire is too often on the obvious side, the charm of these concerts lies in the mixture of the near-perfection of the Boston Symphony with equal parts of nature in the form of rolling mountains, rustling trees, and spreading lawns.

For the cause of music, however, the most important thing at Tanglewood is its school, which is called the Berkshire Music Center. Here, for six weeks, music students can get the finest solo and ensemble training in instrument, voice, and composition. Here, for example, the young conductor-composer Leonard Bernstein took some of his best lessons. This summer he is back again, still on the receiving end from men like Koussevitzky and Aaron Copland, but now, as the local boy who made good, also dishing out some advice of his own.

There exists the danger, of course, that the Berkshire Festival concerts, like Salzburg, will attract too many people who will go, not for the music, but because it is the thing to do. But so long as the school can, as Koussevitzky puts it, stimulate the students to seek "a wider access to inexhaustible treasures of musical art [and] a higher vision of music as a profession," Tanglewood will have lived up to its highest promise.

---

*An estate of more than 200 acres, so called because it was the setting of Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Tanglewood Tales." In 1936 the property was given to the Boston Symphony.

Brahms Cycle Concludes Tanglewood Second Series

Special to The Hartford Times

Lenox, Mass. — Sunday afternoon's concert at Tanglewood concluded the second symphonic series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival and also Dr. Koussevitzky's Brahms cycle of three programs which comprised all four symphonies, two concertos, the Haydn Variations, the Alto Rhapsody and the Tragic Overture. The third and last series will be held Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon.

A reviewer whom custom seats at the most advantageous possible point is likely, in making his estimates, to be unregardful of the thousands of listeners who in fair weather pay a sizable sum to hear Tanglewood's music while relaxing on the beautifully kept lawns surrounding the music shed. For this reason I made it a point of hearing the C minor symphony from several outlying perspectives.

* * *

IT IS TRUE the music streams out into the open with remarkable clarity, even against an adverse breeze. The softer passages tend to fade out but not entirely so, provided there is no interfering conversation or tramping along the gravel paths. But there is astonishingly little of that. Apparently everybody comes to hear the music.

There is, of course, not absolute fidelity; nicety of detail washes out. There is quite a difference in the carrying power of the various instruments which sometimes puts the sound planes out of proportion. But I am convinced that many people do not trouble much about that. It is the atmosphere which matters most and this fabulous setting adds to the general enjoyment what technicalities never can supply. Perhaps we all use music for its background properties more than is realized.

* * *

TWO STERLING artists teamed their talents for the A minor, double Concerto, Violinist Erica Morini and Cellist Gregor Piatigorsky. Their styles were happily matched—aristocratic, zestful and warm-hearted.

Miss Morini's is scarcely an outdoor tone for it is anything but robust; her art is more exquisite. Yet her phrasing, while lacking intensity, managed to convey the essential Brahms locutions.

There is a good deal of statement and answer between the two solo instruments and I got the impression that Piatigorsky tempered his part in these colloquies, for his manner inclines to ruggedness. In the frequent unisons the two instruments produced an unforgettable texture.

The Haydn Variations were set forth by Dr. Koussevitsky with cannily differentiated moods and a pervading nobility.

* * *

CAROL BRICE was given a spontaneous and prolonged ovation Saturday night for her singing of the Alto Rhapsody. She is a statuesque figure with a certain artistic solemnity of bearing that is characteristic of her race. A natural, smoothly-textured contralto voice of no little power in the upper register is th. gift which she used with impressive effect.

She had the vocal support of a male chorus trained by Robert Shaw whom Dr. Koussevitzky brought forward to share in the applause. His contribution was a choral element so nicely ordered as to nuance that it seemed to grow naturally out of the orchestral timbres.

The Rhapsody afforded a striking foil in separating the Third and the Second Symphonies. It is an anomalous burst of romanticism on the part of Classicist Brahms—not the gaudy romanticism of his contemporaries but a throwback to the Schubertian Weltschmerz of the Winter Journey song cycle.

* * *

ITS DARK subjectivism was thrown into high relief by Dr. Koussevitzky who drew from his orchestra in the very opening chords a sobbing quality of startling literalness.

The Symphonies in F and D are twin sisters in the numerous and congenial Brahms family. They are as closely akin in temperament as in tonality. Except for the adagio of the Second there is not a heavy mood in the entire eight movements, all together a contentedly smiling eclogue in so many cantos. This is the music of the plain philosopher, the walker through the woods and fields.

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY kept the music mellow and transparent, subdued excepting the irrestible opportunities for brass choirings, unspectacular until the finale of the D major Symphony which closed the concert with unprecedented brilliance.

But it was the Symphony in F which finished the first half of the concert with, for me, the profoundest effect. It is the very last pages of this Symphony for which all that goes before was made.

Brahms, often—very often—inspired, stood occasionally on the rim of apocalypse but never so near to complete disclosure as here. This seraphic music that sings of chalcedony and jasper, is not the product of a human mind. It was imparted to a mastercraftsman whose pen moved under dictate and what there is of terrestrial stuff in these measures says humbly: And I, John . . . in the isle that is called Patmos . . . saw these things and heard them.

C.E.L.

Surprise by Shostakovich

Aside from the reopening itself, the biggest attraction at last week's Berkshire Festival concert was the American première of Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony. (Its radio première is scheduled for Aug. 10.) After the completion of his Eighth in 1943, the Soviet composer had said that his Ninth would be a Victory Symphony, making up, with the Seventh and Eighth, a war trilogy.

Because it was written in the summer of 1945, after the European war was over, the Ninth which finally appeared could be called a Victory Symphony. Although Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an excellent performance, reflecting a high measure of devotion and preparation to the new work, the tone and style of the Ninth are not what would be expected of Shostakovich. The work is not a long, solemn, and triumphant paean. It is short (25 minutes), gay, exuberant, and even a little boisterous. It is also reminiscent of some of the composer's earlier efforts, like the simple First Symphony or the satiric "The Golden Age" ballet.

Shostakovich, like almost every other composer since Beethoven, confessed he was afraid of the implications of the number nine, and the inevitable comparisons to Beethoven's masterpiece. Perhaps, therefore, in writing so ungrandiose a work, he preferred to reverse his field and make comparisons impossible. Or could it be that Shostakovich, so faithful a musical mirror of his country's moods, is not even certain of his own future course?

[234]

TANGLEWOOD

Opera 'Peter Grimes' Presented for First Time in America

By CYRUS DURGIN

LENOX, Aug. 6—The opera "Peter Grimes," by the young English composer Benjamin Britten, was given its first performance in America here at "Tanglewood" tonight by forces of the Berkshire Music Center. Leonard Bernstein conducted. The Theatre Concert Hall was filled by an invited audience who gave both work and performers a reception of the most cordial sort.

This production marks a new departure at the home of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, for it is the first new stage work and the only one of sizeable proportions to be presented here. It gives a new aspect to a festival center which in the past has been devoted to symphonic music.

"Peter Grimes" is a dramatic, vivid and frequently eloquent music drama. It is very modern in all respects. The voice parts and the orchestra are for the most part joined in a cooperative web of sound, the stage conception derives from the present day theatre, and the dominant purpose is that of dramatic expression in music, acting and stage craft.

The opera was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and is dedicated to the memory of Nathalie Koussevitzky, late wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Peter Grimes" was first performed in England a year ago last June. The present production was staged by Eric Crozier and Frederic Cohen, the former of whom supervised the London production.

Story Set in Fishing Town

Mr. Britten and Librettist Montague Slater found their plot in the poem by the English cleric poet of the late 18th and early 19th centuries, George Crabbe. It is a sombre story set in a small fishing town of Suffolk in England, about 1830. Peter Grimes, a harsh and generally disliked fisherman, is accused of brutally causing the deaths of two of his apprentices. He is haled before a court in the Moot Hall, but is acquitted. In the end, he is driven insane by the ghosts of the dead.

Grimes, of course, is the leading figure, but of importance are Balstrode, a retired sea captain who plays a part in the investigations, and Ellen Orford, a school mistress and a widow who has affection for Peter Grimes.

Whether this opera will gain a lasting place in the repertory only time can tell. It does seem highly significant, however, as much for what Benjamin Britten will later achieve as for what he has accomplished here. He has a telling and imaginative way with orchestrations, he writes in a spare, direct style that wastes no time and no notes. He uses the chorus with exceptionally brilliant effect. Here you have no chorus for the sake of big musical sounds but a chorus used for dramatic propulsion. In his solo voice writing, Britten shows a less practised hand, although there are some unforgettable moments of lyricism.

Above all, the composer conveys a sense of the hard life of fisherfolk and the drab character of their surroundings. His talent is considerable. He begins without any orchestral prelude. As the curtains part on the scene of the Moot Hall (cleverly arranged dramatically, for the situation holds interest from the first), you hear only the babble of the populace. Then the orchestra takes up, and then the voices.

Koussevitzky Speaks

Serge Koussevitzky, addressing theadudeice ust before the first act, spoke of "Peter Grimes" as the second music drama, the first having been Bizet's "Carmen." Of course, that estimate leaves out late Verdi, Wagner, Moussorgsky, Puccini, Mascagni and Leoncavallo, to say nothing of Debussy and Richard Strauss, from whom (especially the latter) Mr. Britten seems to have learned something. He also has learned a thing or two orchestrally, from Sibelius. Yet on the whole "Peter Grimes" is an original and adventurous work.

Mr. Koussetvitzky also spoke of these as "student performances" which they are, but as he explained in his quaint English, "That don't excuses for them, ust the opposite." They are student performamnes, and very good, except in one highly important matter of making the words understandable. Tonight you couldn't have gotten all the drift without a program book.

There are alternating casts for the three hearings, and the orchestra changes between acts. Tonight William Horne gave a creditable account of the leading role, although his voice showed the wear of intensive rehearsals. The Ellen of Florence Manning was clearly voiced, and the Capt Malstrode of James Pease (a professional pleasantly remembered from Philadelphia Opera Company days) was outstanding. Other performances of consequence were those of Robert Gay as Ned Keene, the saloon proprietress of Ellen Carlin and the Mrs. Sedley of Frances Lehnerts.

Mr. Crozier's stage direction is dynamic, not the ridiculous, formularized and static dreariness that characterizes much opera today. The settings, created under supervision of Richard Rychtarik, are colorful in a stylized way. The lighting helps greatly to set and maintain the dramatic mood.

"Peter Grimes" was graphically conducted by Leonard Bernstein, a young musician who was a most logical and admirable choice for the job. His work brought out the drive and dissonance of an opera which is far from "tuneful" in the conventional sense.

All in all, "Peter Grimes" is a step forward for opera in this country, and anywhere for that matter.

says in the . . . saw them.
C.E.L.

Letters Aug 7

Red Cottage Museum

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

There is a movement on to rebuild the red cottage at Tanglewood in which Hawthorne lived, and since the backers are people of influence, i.e., with money and prestige, doubtless a very slick little cottage will soon arise, with antiques and quasi-antiques, nice engraved brass doorplates, and rayon-cords across the chamber doors, complete with everything but the breath of vital use.

The American Notebook is a very vivid and pleasant piece of reading, out surely at this time when so much material is needed for essentials like racetracks and streamlined stores to make the consumers' money go faster (or am I misconstruing the nature of streamlining?) surely then must I protest against that erection of such a structure as the red cottage as a museum. Let us build that cottage up at Williams where a couple of students or some inconsequential teacher might have a library in which to appreciate the American Notebook. That, say I, would be a doubly pleasant memorial, and one to which Hawthorne, and perhaps, Emerson, and his handyman Thoreau might add their testimonials of appreciation.

ERNEST HILL.

Hancock.

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's Times.]

BRITTEN'S 'GRIMES' UNVEILED AT LENOX

New Opera in American Debut at Tanglewood Festival—Bernstein Is Conductor

By OLIN DOWNES

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 6—"Peter Grimes," the opera by the librettist, Montagu Slater, and the composer, Benjamin Britten, designated by Serge Koussevitzky before the curtain as the opera that came "first after Carmen," was given its American première by the students' orchestra, chorus and soloists of the Berkshire Music Center this evening in the Opera Concert Theatre at Tanglewood.

The performance was conducted by Leonard Bernstein, who had as collaborators Eric Crozier and Frederick Cohen, stage directors; Richard Rychtarik, stage designer; Hugh Ross, choral director, and Boris Goldowsky, director of the opera department. Mr. Britten had come from London to attend this production, supervised dramatically by Mr. Crozier, who had directed the world première of the work at Sadlers Wells on June 7.

It is known that this score had been commissioned of Mr. Britten by Dr. Koussevitzky, representing the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation which he established in memory of his late wife, Natalie Koussevitzky, to whom the opera is dedicated. Mr. Britten had said to Dr. Koussevitzky: "This opera is yours." Dr. Koussevitzky related his reply: "No, this opera belongs to the world." He said finally that he had been asked to remind the audience that the performers at this première were students.

A Brilliant Performance

The performance of a modern and very difficult score was astonishingly brilliant on the part of the orchestra, the chorus and, in the sum of it, the gifted and intelligent solo interpreters, whose sincerity was contagious. The cast consisted of William Horne, as Peter Grimes; Florence Manning, as Ellen Orford; James Pease, Captain Balstrode; Ellen Carleen, as Auntie, landlady of "The Boar"; Mildred Mueller and Phyllis Smith, as the nieces of Auntie, and main attractions of the inn; Robert Grey, as Ned Keene; Paul Frank, as Bob Boles; Leonard Trench, as Swallow, the lawyer; Frances Lehnerts, as Mrs. Nabob Sidney; Paul Knowles, as the Rev. Horace Adams; Byron Kelley, as Dr. Thorp, and Matthew Lockhart, as Hobson, the carrier.

The story of the opera is a grim one. It is fashioned in verse from tales, likewise told in verse, taken from the rhymed cycle "The Borough," by George Crabbe, the clergyman-poet of the early nineteenth century in England. Crabbe never had a wide popularity, yet Walter Scott knew his verses by memory and Thomas Hardy was strongly influenced by his realism. Crabbe knew the people of whom he wrote, and, from his own hard youth, the frustrations and vicissitudes of poverty.

The opera has been designated as one not easy to estimate from the traditional standpoint. That is true, so true that one asks whether in actual fact it is an opera at all. For despite its famed realism, mostly lugged in for theatrical purposes sometimes realized and sometimes naively mishandled, it is nearer a dramatic oratorio with stage settings than it is to a living, breathing music drama. Oh, yes, there are chattering fisher-folk, and some boozing, fighting and dancing by trulls and drunkards on the stage. And of course doors fly and windows fly open in the wind, and people come in dripping or drunk as the case may be. They quarrel. And for comic relief there are the nieces and auntie, no better than they should be, scolding or cavorting about. One man draws a knife and another whacks a drum in order to lead a formal procession of peasants, duly armed with clubs, to beat up the fisherman.

Libretto Is Literary

The real story is inside the music, and is conveyed principally by the orchestra and chorus. Its individual characters are hardly real, with the exception of one, Peter Grimes. The rest are star figures, who have no genuine characterization either in the libretto or the music. They are background to throw Grimes into relief and have no organic life of their own. Even Ellen is an effigy, and her principal song one of the poorest pages in the piece. The libretto is more literary than theatrical, more symbolic and psychological than realistic. The drama is not one of individuals, but of man, in his dreams and his pride, pitted against fate and the sea.

But the score is [illegible] first in its integrated, over-all structure, of which no part is a mere accessory of the main idea. The motives or phrases of chorus, principals and orchestra are all bound together, sometimes in free symphonic fashion, but more often in ways that are singularly classic and formal in design. To the orchestra, to be sure, is given a freer role, especially in the four symphonic interludes, when it supplies mood and eerie voices of the storm.

This is more music than theatre, though it amounts to dramatic expression by a composer who knows well his Mussorgsky, Berg and Sibelius, whose technic is dazzling and so brilliant that one is never precisely sure, at first hearings of the music, where the technic ends and the genuine and expression of feeling begins.

There are passages, like the quartet in three parts of ladies in the last act, which seem a little incongruous with the content. It must be admitted that the lyrical phrase, which exposes character or feeling as they are instantaneously and unforgettably expressed for example by the opening phrase of "Tristan" or the motive of just seven notes in which Bizet in "Carmen" lays bare the jealousy of José's soul, are mostly conspicuous by their absence. It is an eclectic, highly organized modern score. The harmonic bite and the vivid colors of the orchestra, sometimes black, sometimes wild and shrill, and now and again of prismatic brilliance, go far toward supplying the sonorous accentuation than the situations need, and there is more than intimation of the sounds and terrors of the sea.

The thematic unity is emphasized by the recurrence in the final scene of motives heard at the beginning, as again the people mend their nets and greet the day. Peter Grimes, a momentary pinpoint on the cosmic horizon, has gone, and the folk resume their way. Mr. Britten might say that the impersonality and objectivity of his pages are precisely justified by the symbolism of his tale and may be taken as reflection of the nature that he knows well. He, too, was born by the sea.

At any rate, this opera is a prodigious advance, in form, technic and integration of its elements, over the one work of his in dramatic form, the chamber opera, "Paul Bunyan," that was heard in 1941 in New York. "Peter Grimes" is the work of a composer, 33, still at the threshold of his powers, whose latest opera, "The Rape of Lucrece" is mentioned from authoritative sources as a further conspicuous advance. A young composer who can go so fast and so far so soon is one to be watched respectfully.

REPUBLICAN

AUG 7 - 1946

TANGLEWOOD HAS OPERA'S PREMIERE

Capacity Audience of 1200 at 'Peter Grimes' — Many Music Critics and Managers Are Present

Lenox, Aug. 6—A capacity audience of 1200 tonight filled the Tanglewood theater-concert hall for the premiere performance in America of Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes." Among the 50 music critics and managers present was Eddie Dowling, actor and producer of "The Glass Menagerie."

William Horne sang the title role, Miss Florence Manning had the soprano lead, and James Pease sang the role of Capt Balstrode. Tomorrow night Joseph Laderoude will sing the title role and Miss Frances Yeend the leading soprano part. The cast and chorus are students of the Berkshire Music center.

Leonard Bernstein, assistant to Serge Koussevitzky as instructor in conducting, is the conductor of the opera; Hugh Ross is choral director; Boris Goldovsky, director of the opera department; Richard Rychtarik, stage designer; and Eric Crozier and Fred Cohen, stage directors.

Mr Dowling was accompanied by his partner, Louis Singer. In the audience were the composer and Ralph Hawkes of the music publishing house at London, who was instrumental in bringing Mr Britten to Tanglewood to supervise, with Eric Corzier, the original stage director, the performance by the Berkshire Music center.

Also in the audience were Lincoln Kirstein, director of the Ballet Opera Co.; Mrs Andrew H. Hepburn of Concord, who gave Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Mr Hepburn; Jerome B. Green of Boston, former president of the orchestra, and Mrs Greene; Mrs Ernest B. Dane, whose late husband was a president and benefactor of the orchestra; Mrs Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, patroness of chamber music, who sponsored the series of concerts on the first four Tuesday evenings of the school session; Reginald Stewart, conductor of the Baltimore Symphony orchestra, and Mrs Stewart; President and Mrs Herbert Davis of Smith college; and Sir Arthur and Lady Salter of London, who are at Hickory farm, Tyringham.

Open by invitation to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music center, the performance will be repeated tomorrow evening and Friday evening at 8.15.

Prominent Personages To Attend 'Peter Grimes'

American Premier of Opera at Tanglewood Brings Eddie Dowling and Others

More than 50 critics, many prominent musicians and Eddie Dowling, actor and producer of "The Glass Managerie," will attend the first American performance of the opera, "Peter Grimes," at Tanglewood tonight.

William Horne will sing the title role tonight, Miss Florence Manning will sing the soprano lead, and James Pease will sing the role of Capt. Balstrode. Tomorrow night, Joseph Laderoude will sing the title role and Miss Frances Yeend the leading soprano part. The cast and chorus are students of the Berkshire Music Center.

Leonard Bernstein, assistant to Serge Koussevitzky in teaching conducting, is the conductor of the opera; Hugh Ross is the choral director; Boris Goldovsky, director of the opera department; Richard Rychtarik, stage designer, and Eric Crozier and Fred Cohen, stage directors.

Others in Audience

Mr. Dowling will be accompanied by his partner, Louis Singer. In the audience will be Benjamin Britten, the composer, and Ralph Hawkes of the music publishing house in London that was instrumental in bringing Mr. Britten to Tanglewood to supervise, with Mr. Crozier, the original stage director, the performance by the Berkshire Music Center.

Also in the audience will be Lincoln Kirstein, director of the Ballet Opera Company; Mrs. Andrew Hepburn of Concord, who gave Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Hepburn; Jerome B. Greene of Boston, former president of the orchestra, and Mrs. Greene; Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, whose late husband was a president and benefactor of the orchestra; Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, patroness of chamber music who sponsored the series of concerts on the first four Tuesday evenings of the school session; Reginald Stewart, conductor of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Stewart; President and Mrs. Herbert Davis of Smith College; and Lord and Lady Salter of England.

Leonard Bernstein

Open by invitation to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, the performance will be repeated tomorrow evening and Friday evening at 8.15.

aug 7

'Peter Grimes' Has Premiere At Tanglewood

Music Center Students Perform Britten's New Opera

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood established an imposing milestone in its records and in the annals of American music last night when its students presented the first American performance of Benjamin Britten's new opera, "Peter Grimes." An invited audience of particular distinction filled the Theatre-Concert Hall, and gave enthusiastic approval to the performers, the conductor, Leonard Bernstein, the composer, who had come from England especially for the occasion, and to the many others who had been instrumental in shaping the opera for performance, Hugh Ross, choral conductor, Richard Rychtarik, stage designer, Eric Crozier and Frederic Cohen, stage directors, the former who had performed the analogous task at the opera's premiere at the Sadler's Wells Theatre in London last year.

Young Mr. Britten (who was born in 1913), has had wide success in America with his works. The present opera was written on commission by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and is dedicated to Natalie Koussevitzky, the late wife of the director of the center. Mr. Britten found his original inspiration in a poem of the English poet, George Crabbe, entitled "The Borough." The words for the libretto are by Montagu Slater, and concerns the gloomy career of a poor fisherman in a small town on the Suffolk coast. Peter Grimes, in the prologue, stands in court accused of the death of his apprentice. His acquittal does not satisfy the townspeople, and the three acts, each divided into two scenes, recount the rising vigilante spirit of the town's citizenry, and, in contrary motion, the falling spirit of the sadly harassed-in-soul fisherman.

Opens With Court Scene

After the court-scene prologue with which the opera immediately begins, the action takes place in the market place with the meeting hall to the left and the town "pub" to the right. The sea is discernible at the far center. The stage is early thickly populated with a variety of individuals and groups whom Mr. Britten contrives throughout the opera to have on stage a good share of the time, and to whom he gives more than ample opportunity for chorus-singing. Indeed, we found this one of the most rewarding features, both in the score, and in the evidence of Mr. Ross' work, of the whole opera.

To Leonard Bernstein's heroic and dependable beat the chorus sang with genuinely serious intentions toward the unfortunate Peter. Indeed, if there was any trace of less than professionalism in the chorus, it was in the earnestness they displayed both in their voices and in their demeanor.

Mr. Britten has created a mood of the sea and of the ominously brooding character of his play. He achieves the greatest distinction in his choral writing. He treats the voices as background often, even as instruments of an orchestra wherein each section maintains its individuality within the scope of the entire ensemble. This device allows the building of long, big climaxes which culminate in vibrant excitement. Such a scene was enacted within the Boar when Peter leads his new apprentice home. This particular scene had been one of the most effective and provided a contrast relief in the music assigned "Auntie the landlady and her two volatile nieces." This scene also permitted the appropriate introduction of a happy round "gone fishing." Other choruses which were conspicuously successful were the "Tide Waits for No Man" in the first act and "Grimes Is at His Exercise" in the second.

Peter Expansive

For the title-role, last night faithfully acted and sung by William Horne, Mr. Britten has written a full and expansive character of which a soliloquy in the last act, sung without accompaniment, is tremendously effective from a dramatic viewpoint. Here Peter assays his assets and liabilities in the scale of public opinion. The role makes exceptional demands on the singer, for all of which, however, Mr. Horne was completely adequate. There was a trace of pressure in the ample power of his voice, yet it was equally capable of tenderness as shown in the solo in his hut at the end of the second act. Jumps of ninths against coercive harmonies in the orchestra are some of the difficulties written by Britten for all the principals and not alone for Grimes. Florence Manning as Mrs. Ellen and James Pease as Captain Balstrode were vocally histrionically secure and convincing. The remainder of the cast were able complements to the principals: Ellen Carleen as "Auntie," Mildred Mueller and Phyllis Smith as the nieces, Robert Gray as Ned Keene, Paul Franke as Bob Boles, Leonard Treash as Swallow, Frances Lehnerts as Mrs. Sedley, Paul Knowles as Rev. Adams, Byron R. Kelley as Dr. Thorp and Matthew Lockhart as Hobson. Frederic Zighera as the apprentice was expressively silent.

To Leonard Bernstein belongs a massive share of the credit for such a performance. He gave impetus to the whole evening, yet maintained control of his vocalists and inexperienced chorus and orchestra. Except for a very few scattered ragged moments on the stage and in the pit, this initial performance went smoothly and with certainty. The dramatic climaxes were powerfully built up to high points of excitement, and the half-dozen interludes which Mr. Britten has written were effectively portrayed. The viola solo in the fifth interlude and the theme of the final one between the scenes of the last act were deeply moving. The curtain of the first scene of this act was of the highest dramatic intensity.

Britten Called to Stage

There are several melodies which may be carried away. Mr. Britten has remained within credible harmonic limits, and scored his best effects by creating dramatic situations musically, so much so, that without stage action, it is still engrossing. He was brought to the stage only after the cast and the conductor and his assistants in all the capacities had been presented to the audience, and had been recalled many times. Dr. Koussevitzky stepped to the stage before the prologue to voice his admiration of Mr. Britten and his opera. He made a few remarks in which he praised the composer extravagantly and particularly mentioned the assistance of Eric Crozier who had come from London only at the beginning of the week but whose experience with the initial production in London last year was of inestimable benefit to the production at Tanglewood. The opera will be repeated this evening with Joseph Laderoute in the title role and Frances Yeend as Mrs. Ellen. Again on Friday evening it will be played and with the principals of last night's cast.

Koussevitzky Taken To Task for Remark

A. J. Pelletier of 137 Elm Street, in a letter to Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has asked for "further enlightenment" apropos the remarks made by the orchestra's conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in which the conductor said that the student orchestra at Tanglewood is as good as Cleveland or Cincinnati.

Mr. Pelletier, former member of the Cleveland Orchestra and active in Berkshire music circles, labeled Dr. Koussevitzky's remarks as "lacking the tact and taste that a man of his influence should exhibit before the public.' The conductor's comparison was made in a speech he gave at the annual members' night at the Berkshire Museum last Friday. Mr. Pelletier's letter follows:

I hope inquiry on your part will disclose that Dr. Koussevitzky was joking when he told an audience at the Berkshire Museum here Friday night that the student orchestra at Tanglewood this year, after three weeks of rehearsal, is as good as the orchestras of Cleveland or Cincinnati.

I know little about the Cincinnati Orchestra, although I am acquainted with some of the very excellent musicians who are its members. I am, however, jealous of the reputation of the Cleveland Orchestra of which I was a member for many years, and I take Dr. Koussevitzky's remarks as lacking the tact and taste that a man of his influence should exhibit before the public. His statement is not only a direct slap at skilled and experienced players who make up the Cleveland Orchestra, and in whose hall the Bostonians are happy to play each year, but also an affront to Dr. Artur Rodzinski who brought the orchestra to its present state of excellence. There is no orchestra, not even Dr. Koussevitzky's, as he most certainly must know, which is perfect in every detail. Even the worthy doctor, while he claims that musical culture in America began its ascendency with his transfer from the Volga, via the Seine to the Charles, has not been able in a quarter of a century to bring the Bostonians to that state. It does, therefore, seem presumptuous on his part to claim that boys and girls with little professional experience, play as well together after three weeks under student and assistant batons as do the Clevelanders directed by able and rising conductors.

Perhaps the less said the better about Dr. Koussevitzky's scorn of the Italian opera composers. It would make good reading if Arturo Toscanini, who has conducted these works at every opportunity, would give his opinion. Perhaps it is because the Boston Orchestra's leader has not extended his interests to the field of opera that he feels the day he does.

But it is because he looks down his nose at the Clevelanders that I write to ask for further enlightment.

Distinguished Audience Witnesses Premiere

A distinguished musical and theatrical audience attended the American premiere of "Peter Grimes" at Tanglewood last evening.

Among those who came to Lenox to hear the opera presented for the first time in the Western Hemisphere were Miss Gladys Swarthout, Metropolitan Opera star, and her husband, Frank Chapman; Robert Merrill, baritone of the Metropolitan; Nicholas Rescigno, former conductor of the San Carlo Opera Company; Boris Morris, who is producing the movie, "Carnegie Hall"; Eddie Dowling and Louis Singer, producers of "The Glass Menagerie"; Tom Scott, ballad singer; Miss Margaret Matzenauer, former contralto of the Metropolitan.

Also Laszlo Holasz, musical and artistic director of the New York City Opera Company; Miss Doris Doree, John Dudley and Hubert Norville, also of the New York City Opera Company; Marc Blitzstein, composer of "The Air Borne Symphony" and "The Cradle Will Rock," who directed the music on the American invasion radio station in London; Moshe Paranov, director of the Hart School of Music, Hartford, Conn.; and Jean Dalrymple, press agent and producer.

A capacity audience is expected for the second performance tonight, when Joseph Laderoute will sing the title role, Miss Frances Yeend that of Ellen Orford, the schoolmistress; Duane W. Crossley, the part of Swallow, a lawyer; Robert Long, of Bob Boles, a fisherman; Miss Irene Jordan, Mrs. Sedley, the gossiping widow. For Friday night's performance Mr. Laderoute and Miss Yeend will continue in the leads. The other members of the cast will be the same as for the opening.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 7 - 1946

'Peter Grimes' in Debut

Benjamin Briteen's Opera Is Presented At Tanglewood Before Capacity Audience

By CARL E. LINDSTROM
Special to The Hartford Times

Lenox, Mass. — It was impossible to witness the American premiere of Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes" here last night without realizing that something very important had happened to opera. This was the thing for which there had been much waiting and watching; it left behind much that was old in music; it crystallized almost everything that was new. It was moreover a gripping theater experience—a powerful show, if you like.

The young Englishman's opera was commissioned by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and is dedicated to ~~the memory of~~ his late wife, Natalie Koussevitzky. The libretto was freely constructed by Montagu Slater out of material in the poem "The Borough" by George Crabbe, whose vignettes were based upon life in an English East Coast town of the early nineteenth century.

* * *

THE CHARACTERS of the opera are "Auntie," landlady of "The Boar," Captain Balstrode, a kindly retired skipper, Swallow, a lawyer the Rector who "ever aimed to please, and to offend was cautious," Ellen Orford, widowed school mistress, and various other village personalities. Chief of these is Peter Grimes, a lone, misunderstood and eventually mad fisherman, who maltreats successively two workhouse boy apprentices.

Both die. The action of the opera begins with the inquest over the death of the first. Suspected of murder, Grimes is freed for lack of evidence. Another apprentice is provided for him but a fateful accident takes his life as well. There are mob threats against Grimes but he escapes only through suicide by putting out to sea in his boat and scuttling it.

Grimes is a strange misfit combining the intuition and imagination of the poet with the brutal instinct and the mental unbalance which undo him.

* * *

SELDOM HAVE music and drama been more closely intertwined. The Wagnerian orchestral commentary is transparent and literal beside Britten's complexity and subtlety of detail. Vocal and symphonic elements are warp and woof. There is no aria singing whatsoever, and no choruses in the ordinary sense of the word.

The whole opera is choral, of course, in the purest sense of the word, but just as much so when Grimes sings solo as when the stage is crowded for an intricate ensemble. Important as are the instrumental interludes which provide an atmospheric curtain between scenes, the orchestra never becomes dominant.

* * *

BRITTEN has made free use of dissonance but it grows out of polytonality rather than deliberate harmonic saltiness. Time and again he superimposes one key upon another with greatest effect—usually conveying a sense of conflict or action on two different dramatic planes simultaneously. The antiphon between the music of the chapel service and the colloquy of Grimes and Ellen outside is masterfully done. The music throughout is importunate and terrifically absorbing.

The only purely lyrical bit in the opera is Ellen's beautiful meditation in the last when the boy's embroidered jersey is washed up by the tide. The long soliloquy of Peter Grimes in the second act is an impressive piece of declamation. Although this is not quite the Sprechstimme employed by Alban Berg, it is safe to say that Wozzeck prepared the way for Peter Grimes. It is in this particular, and in ever so many other details, that Britten's opera represents a culmination of music drama for our time.

* * *

THE ENTIRE production was by students of the Berkshire Music Center—orchestra, direction, cast. The latter will be changed for subsequent performances as—novelty of novelties—a different set of players made up the orchestra for the second act last night!

Leonard Bernstein conducted ~~and did a closely-knit~~ authoritative and inspirational job of it. Dr. Koussevitzky was present, moving about during intermission with a fatherly arm over the shoulder of young Britten.

Tanglewood's theater - concert hall was filled to its capacity of some thousand intent listeners, who hung on every word of this opera in English—or those which they could distinguish.

The credits are many and a simple roll-call will have to suffice for this expert and historic production: Stage direction, Eric Crozier and Frederic Cohen; stage designer, Richard Rychtarik; choral direction, Hugh Ross; general direction, Boris Goldovsky.

The principals last night were: Grimes, William Horne; Ellen, Florence Manning; Capt. Balstrode, James Pease; Auntie, Ellen Carleen; Swallow, Leonard Treash; the rector, Paul Knowles; Mrs. Sedley, Frances Lehnerts.

Those taking part in the performance here tonight are all students of the Berkshire Music Center. The title role was sung finely by William Horne. Principals supporting him were Florence Manning as the schoolmistress, James Pease as Captain Balstrode, and Frederic Zighera as the apprentice boy, John.

Speaking briefly before the performance, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the center, said that there are only two great music dramas, "Carmen" and Mr. Britten's opera 'Peter Grimes'." It will take more time to prove the greatness of "Peter Grimes," but right now this courier will take it for an exciting operatic evening in place of Bizet's prank any time.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

AUG 7 - 1946

New Opera Is Intensely Interesting

'Peter Grimes' Given American Premiere at Tanglewood by Center

BY T. H. PARKER.

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 6. — (Spe- ial.)—The American premiere of Peter Grimes," a three act opera y the British composer Benja- nin Britten, commissioned by the oussevitzky Music Foundation in ~~941, was presented at Tan~~glewood ere tonight under auspices of the erkshire Music Center. Though he war had prevented its being one in this country earlier, it ad been given in England several mes since its completion in Feb- uary, 1945.

As given at the Center theater onight with Leonard Bernstein as onductor, Hugh Ross as choral irector, and Eric Cozier and rederick Cohen as stage direc- ors, in Richard Rychtarik's set- ings, Mr. Britten's first opera roved to be an intensely inter- esting and intensely dramatic vork.

The composer has set himself the special problem of converting into opera with the aid of Montagu Slater, librettist, a poem, "The Borough," written by the English poet, George Crabbe, in 1810. It recounts the life and hard times of Peter Grimes, a fisherman on the English East Coast, "the heart of man who fits nowhere into the world," whose "streak of imagination and poetry separate him from his neighbors, whose violence turns this separation into rebellion" and who is suspected by the villagers of having caused the death of two boys apprenticed to him. He is befriended only by the village schoolmarm and a rugged, retired sea captain. The opera is a tragedy and ends in Grimes's death caused by the relentless animosity of his neighbors.

Score Forbidding, Bleak.

The score which Mr. Britten has written for this stark subject is equally forbidding, bleak and intense. Hardly a lyric moment appears in it. He has filled it brimful and running over with the wrath of Grimes and the villagers, and most of all with the resurgence of the monstrous sea, its wild pulse and its eternal threat. He has carried out these purposes with long stretches of clamorous choral writing and furious orchestral interludes. The music itself, though thoroughly modern in the freedom and imagination of its handling, remains in essence academic. Such stridency as arises in it comes not from musical but dramatic sources. It is more arresting for its melodic treatment than its harmonies. The melodic lines are excitingly free and Mr. Britten has shaped them almost entirely to the tune and cadence of natural speech rather than to any standard ideas of belcanto.

There is the constant effect of singsong recitative and the moments in which it even approaches the pretty arias of conventional opera are exceedingly few. The variety and the inventiveness with which the vocal lines are treated are without doubt the most stimulating feature of the entire opera and show Mr. Britten's talents at their most orginal and effective best. At the same time the singing lines have been most ingeniously woven into the thick web of music which constitutes the orchestral score. It is in the latter that the music shows its one apparent fault, the occasional substitution of din for drama, and nerve-plucking in place of real emotion.

Excellent Production.

The stage directors, Messrs. Crozier and Cohen, and Mr. Rychtarek, designer, have given Mr. Britten magnificent aid in producing a grim and tumultuous drama. The staging is full of rush and crush, and the singers are carried around the stage with the turbulence, weight and tension of the music itself. The staging is realistic, except for the superimposed air of erriness which lies over the whole, the music, the drama, the scene. The lighting is particularly fine. Hugh Ross has produced handsome choral effectiveness throughout the opera and Boris Goldovsky, director of the center opera department, has brought the cast to a most gratifying excellence as actors and singers.

'Peter Grimes' Has Premiere At Tanglewood

First American Production of Britten Opera Is Given by Berkshire Students

By Francis D. Perkins

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 6.—The Berkshire Music Center gave the first American production of Benjamin Britten's opera "Peter Grimes" this evening in the theater at Tanglewood, where Leonard Bernstein conducted a cast and orchestra composed of the Centers' students.

William Horne sang the title role of the ill-starred fisherman Grimes, with Florence Manning as Ellen, the widowed schoolmistress who strives vainly to save Grimes from the results of his own temperament.

Others in the cast were James Pease as Balstrode, Ellen Carleen as Auntie the landlady, Mildred Mueller and Phyllis Smith as the two nieces, Robert Gay as Keene, Paul Franke as Boles, Leonard Treash as Swallow, Frances Lehnerts as Mrs. Sedley, Paul Knowles as the rector, Byron Kelley as Doctor Thorp and Matthew Lockhart as Hobson. Frederic Zighera had the silent but important role as the boy apprentice.

Besides Mr. Bernstein, those concerned in the preparation and production of this exceptional English opera were Eric Crozier and Frederic Cohen, stage directors; Richard Rychtarik, stake designer; Hugh Ross, choral director, and Boris Goldovsky, director of the Center's opera department. Mr. Britten arrived recently to take a hand in the final preparations.

Appropriate Premier

It was appropriate that "Peter Grimes" should have its American premiere at Tanglewood since it was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation before Mr. Britten's return to England four years ago. The work has had a successful career in its own country since its London production in June, 1945, and a hearing of last night's final rehearsal suggested that the advance interest which it has aroused here is well justified. The work gave a sense of individuality and vitality, dramatic tension and often dramatic excitement; the score reveals remarkable ability for musical characterization and the creation in musical terms of a definite atmosphere.

This atmosphere is that of the scene of Montagu Slater's libretto, the Suffolk Coast of England. Sometimes the score suggests the seacoast vividly and specifically, as in the storm interlude in the first act, where the orchestra tells of rising winds, salt water and crying sea birds. At other times it is present as a background to the musical and dramatic action.

The libretto, derived from George Crabbe's poem, "The Borough," can be said to have two protagonists :Grimes and the community in which he lives and which he dislikes. He wishes to impress the community, and his ruthless devotion to his work and his ambitions leads to his downfall. And yet he is not fundamentally cruel: one can be sorry for him and feel that if things had turned out a little differently he might have been a successful man, no longer at odds with his fellows.

The libretto fulfills its aims in presenting the tragedy of Grimes itself, and in most of its other characterizations, which are not stock opera types. It is, at times, rather too detailed and sometimes too literary, and, while the main thread of the story is not lost ,it is occasionally obscured: there are discussions and philosophizings which seemed hard to project across the fottlights. Such an impression gathered at a rehearsal may be subject to later amendment, and the same reservation should be made about impressions of the music. This tells of a well defined creative individuality combined with a sense of the theater. There is variety of style, but no sense of derivativeness.

Benjamin Britten

Composer of the opera "Peter Grimes," which was presented at Tanglewood last night by the Berkshire Music Center

Not Doctrinaire Music

It is music of today which is not doctrinaire: it is consonant or dissonant, melodious or pungent, according to the demands of the dramatic situation.

Some of its tunes are readily rememberable, but on a first hearing the treatment of the ideas, rather than the musical ideas themselves, is a strong point of the score—the projections of dramatic emotion by skilful use, combination and contrasts of musical color and atmosphere. There are some static moments, but the development of a dramatic situation, sustained and increasing tension in a long approach to a climax, are among the features which make this score an unusual achievement.

It is most telling in the writing for the orchestra and the chorus and also in the use of these as a background or contrast for the singing of the soloists. The solo writing can often be described as recitative of an elastic type, varying from conversation at one end to what is nearly an aria at the other, as in the sustained solos of Ellen and Grimes. The text is not always easy to sing, and the solo music, while often eloquent, is at times exacting. In his distinguished writing for the soloists, Mr. Britten has not always solved the problems involved; elsewhere his solutions are distinctly successful.

But the work as a whole is an English opera of a new kind, nationally as well as personally individual, and its future in this country is to be awaited with much interest.

It will be repeated tomorrow with some changes of cast, including Joseph Laderoute as Grimes, Frances Yeend as Ellen, Robert Long as Boles, Duane Crossley as Swallow and Irene Jordan as Mrs. Sedley. All seats are already taken both for tomorrow and a third performance on Friday night.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 7 - 1946

BRITTEN'S 'GRIMES' UNVEILED AT LENOX

New Opera in American Debut at Tanglewood Festival—Bernstein Is Conductor

By OLIN DOWNES

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 6—"Peter Grimes," the opera by the librettist, Montagu Slater, and the composer, Benjamin Britten, designated by Serge Koussevitzky before the curtain as the opera that came "first after Carmen," was given its American première by the students' orchestra, chorus and soloists of the Berkshire Music Center this evening in the Opera Concert Theatre at Tanglewood.

The performance was conducted by Leonard Bernstein, who had as collaborators Eric Crozier and Frederick Cohen, stage directors; Richard Rychtarik, stage designer; Hugh Ross, choral director, and Boris Goldowsky, director of the opera department. Mr. Britten had come from London to attend this production, supervised dramatically by Mr. Crozier, who had directed the world première of the work at Sadlers Wells on June 7.

It is known that this score had been commissioned of Mr. Britten by Dr. Koussevitzky, representing the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation which he established in memory of his late wife, Natalie Koussevitzky, to whom the opera is dedicated. Mr. Britten had said to Dr. Koussevitzky: "This opera is yours." Dr. Koussevitzky related his reply: "No, this opera belongs to the world." He said finally that he had been asked to remind the audience that the performers at this première were students.

A Brilliant Performance

The performance of a modern and very difficult score was astonishingly brilliant on the part of the orchestra, the chorus and, in the sum of it, the gifted and intelligent solo interpreters, whose sincerity was contagious. The cast consisted of William Horne, as Peter Grimes; Florence Manning, as Ellen Orford; James Pease, Captain Balstrode; Ellen Carleen, as Auntie, landlady of "The Boar"; Mildred Mueller and Phyllis Smith, as the nieces of Auntie, and main attractions of the inn; Robert Grey, as Ned Keene; Paul Frank, as Bob Boles; Leonard Trench, as Swallow, the lawyer; Frances Lehnerts, as Mrs. Nabob Sidney; Paul Knowles, as the Rev. Horace Adams; Byron Kelley, as Dr. Thorp, and Matthew Lockhart, as Hobson, the carrier.

The story of the opera is a grim one. It is fashioned in verse from tales, likewise told in verse, taken from the rhymed cycle "The Borough," by George Crabbe, the clergyman-poet of the early nineteenth century in England. Crabbe never had a wide popularity, yet Walter Scott knew his verses by memory and Thomas Hardy was strongly influenced by his realism. Crabbe knew the people of whom he wrote, and, from his own hard youth, the frustrations and vicissitudes of poverty.

The opera has been designated as one not easy to estimate from the traditional standpoint. That is true, so true that one asks whether in actual fact it is an opera at all. For despite its famed realism, mostly lugged in for theatrical purposes sometimes realized and sometimes naively mishandled, it is nearer a dramatic oratorio with stage settings than it is to a living, breathing music drama. Oh, yes, there are chattering fisher-folk, and some boozing, fighting and dancing by trulls and drunkards on the stage. And of course doors fly and windows fly open in the wind, and people come in dripping or drunk as the case may be. They quarrel. And for comic relief there are the nieces and auntie, no better than they should be, scolding or cavorting about. One man draws a knife and another whacks a drum in order to lead a formal procession of peasants, duly armed with clubs, to beat up the fisherman.

The real story is inside the music, and is conveyed principally by the orchestra and chorus. Its individual characters are hardly real, with the exception of one, Peter Grimes. The rest are star figures, who have no genuine characterization either in the libretto or the music. They are background to throw Grimes into relief and have no organic life of their own. Even Ellen is an effigy, and her principal song one of the poorest pages in the piece. The libretto is more literary than theatrical, more symbolic and psychological than realistic. The drama is not one of individuals, but of man, in his dreams and his pride, pitted against fate and the sea.

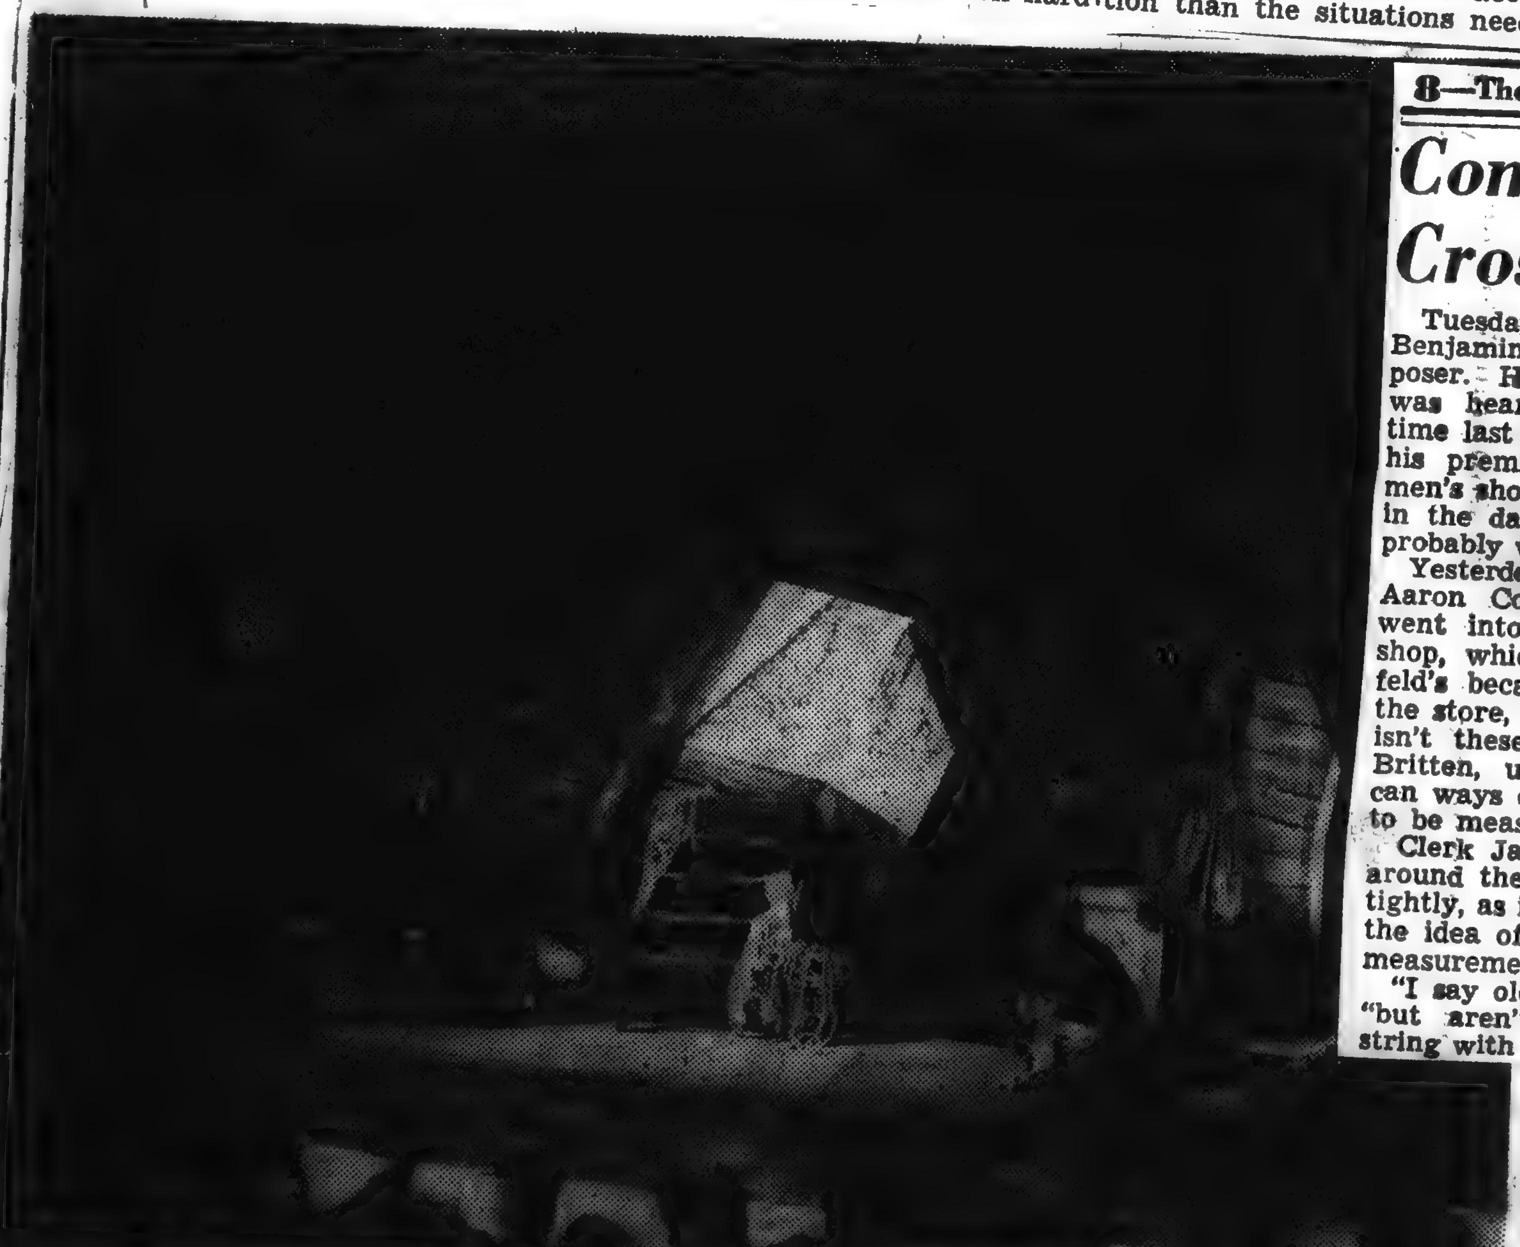
But the score is astonishing, first in its integrated, over-all structure, of which no part is a mere accessory of the main idea. The motives or phrases of chorus, principals and orchestra are all bound together, sometimes in free symphonic fashion, but more often in ways that are singularly classic and formal in design. To the orchestra, to be sure, is given a freer role, especially in the four symphonic interludes, when it supplies mood and eerie voices of the storm.

This is more music than theatre, though it amounts to dramatic expression by a composer who knows well his Mussorgsky, Berg and Sibelius, whose technic is dazzling and so brilliant that one is never precisely sure, at first hearings of the music, where the technic ends and the genuine and expression of feeling begins.

There are passages, like the quartet in three parts of ladies in the last act, which seem a little incongruous with the content. It must be admitted that the lyrical phrase, which exposes character or feeling as they are instantaneously and unforgettably expressed for example by the opening phrase of "Tristan" or the motive of just seven notes in which Bizet in "Carmen" lays bare the jealousy of José's soul, are mostly conspicuous by their absence. It is an eclectic, highly organized modern score. The harmonic bite and the vivid colors of the orchestra, sometimes black, sometimes wild and shrill, and now and again of prismatic brilliance, go far toward supplying the sonorous accentuation than the situations need, and there is more than intimation of the sounds and terrors of the sea.

The thematic unity is emphasized by the recurrence in the final scene of motives heard at the beginning, as again the people mend their nets and greet the day. Peter Grimes, a momentary pinpoint on the cosmic horizon, has gone, and the folk resume their way. Mr. Britten might say that the impersonality and objectivity of his pages are precisely justified by the symbolism of his tale and may be taken as reflection of the nature that he knows well. He, too, was born by the sea.

At any rate, this opera is a prodigious advance, in form, technic and integration of its elements, over the one work of his in dramatic form, the chamber opera, "Paul Bunyan," that was heard in 1941 in New York. "Peter Grimes" is the work of a composer, 33, still at the threshold of his powers, whose latest opera, "The Rape of Lucrece" is mentioned from authoritative sources as a further conspicuous advance. A young composer who can go so fast and so far so soon is one to be watched respectfully.



PETER GRIMES: One of the moving scenes from the new opera, "Peter Grimes," given its Western Hemisphere premiere last night at Tanglewood. Peter, played by William Horne, is shown in his cabin where he has brought his apprentice, Frederic Zighera.

TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER

AUG 7 - 1946

Closing Events At Tanglewood

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 7 — With the first western hemisphere performance of Benjamin Britten's, opera, "Peter Grimes," last night, the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood entered upon its last and busiest week. Fourteen events will be open to friends of the center and the public within the next six days.

Opera scenes by the opera workshop are planned for Thursday afternoon at 3:30 and Saturday at 2:30. They will be presented in the formal garden if weather permits; in the chamber music hall if it is wet. Friday evening "Peter Grimes" will be repeated.

On Thursday afternoon at 4:30 department 5 orchestra will give a symphony concert and on Friday at 2:15 department 2 orchestra will play. Olin Downes, New York Times music editor, will give the last of four lectures on "The Art of Criticism" Friday at 4:30. The last event by students of the school will be a chamber music concert by department 2 group Sunday morning at 10:30.

The final series of festival concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky will be Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon. There will be a public rehearsal for the benefit of the pension fund Saturday morning at 10.

8—The Berkshire County Eagle, Wednesday, Aug. 7, 1946 ★★

Composer Britten, Local Clerk Cross Finish, Neck and Neck

Tuesday was premiere day for Benjamin Britten, English composer. His opera "Peter Grimes" was heard publicly for the first time last night at Tanglewood and his premiere as a United States men's shop patron was held earlier in the day. The latter experience probably was a little more trying.

Yesterday afternoon Britten and Aaron Copland, a contemporary, went into a local men's clothing shop, which we shall call Rosenfeld's because that's the name of the store, in quest of shirts. (Who isn't these days?). What's more, Britten, unaccustomed to American ways of outfitting, had to ask to be measured for shirt size.

Clerk James Brett put the tape around the musician's neck rather tightly, as is his usual routine, with the idea of adding one size to the measurement indicated on the tape.

"I say old man," gulped Britten, "but aren't you applying that string with a lot of strength?"

"What I usually do," answered Brett facetiously, "is pull it tight until I see the customer get blue in the face."

"Well, that's quite interesting," the composer countered. "What shade of blue do you look for?"

Aug 7 Globe

Fiedler Knows Best

To the Editor—Your reader who criticizes the Pops programs does not realize that there are many people in Boston who enjoy listening to the light, refreshing excerpts from the great musicals of Cole Porter, Irving Berlin and others. This is the music of the people who attend the Pops concerts night after night; the numbers are carefully selected by Mr. Arthur Fiedler, whose knowledge of music must exceed that of your outspoken reader.

HORACE A. JOHNSON.
Waltham.

P. S.—My definition of "Pops," from the Latin "populus," is: the people.

'Peter Grimes' Has Premiere At Tanglewood

First American Production of Britten Opera Is Given by Berkshire Students

By Francis D. Perkins

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 6.—The Berkshire Music Center gave the first American production of Benjamin Britten's opera "Peter Grimes" this evening in the theater at Tanglewood, where Leonard Bernstein conducted a cast and orchestra composed of the Centers' students.

William Horne sang the title role of the ill-starred fisherman Grimes, with Florence Manning as Ellen, the widowed schoolmistress who strives vainly to save Grimes from the results of his own temperament.

Others in the cast were James Pease as Balstrode, Ellen Carleen as Auntie the landlady, Mildred Mueller and Phyllis Smith as the two nieces, Robert Gay as Keene, Paul Franke as Boles, Leonard Treash as Swallow, Frances Lehnerts as Mrs. Sedley, Paul Knowles as the rector, Byron Kelley as Doctor Thorp and Matthew Lockhart as Hobson. Frederic Zighera had the silent but important role as the boy apprentice.

Besides Mr. Bernstein, those concerned in the preparation and production of this exceptional English opera were Eric Crozier and Frederic Cohen, stage directors; Richard Rychtarik, stake designer; Hugh Ross, choral director, and Boris Goldovsky, director of the Center's opera department. Mr. Britten arrived recently to ake a hand in the final prepara-ions.

Appropriate Premier

It was appropriate that "Peter Grimes" should have its American remiere at Tanglewood since it as commissioned by the Kousevitzky Music Foundation before Mr. Britten's return to England our years ago. The work has had successful career in its own ountry since its London producion in June, 1945, and a hearing f last night's final rehearsal sugested that the advance interest hich it has aroused here is well ustified. The work gave a sense f individuality and vitality, dranatic tension and often dramatic xcitement; the score reveals remarkable ability for musical charcterization and the creation in musical terms of a definite atmosphere.

This atmosphere is that of the cene of Montagu Slater's libretto, he Suffolk Coast of England. Sometimes the score suggests the eacoast vividly and specifically, s in the storm interlude in the rst act, where the orchestra tells f rising winds, salt water and rying sea birds. At other times t is present as a background to he musical and dramatic action.

The libretto, derived from George Crabbe's poem, "The Borough," can be said to have wo protagonists :Grimes and the ommunity in which he lives and hich he dislikes. He wishes to mpress the community, and his uthless devotion to his work and is ambitions leads to his downall. And yet he is not fundamentally cruel: one can be sorry or him and feel that if things ad turned out a little differently e might have been a successful man, no longer at odds with his ellows.

The libretto fulfills its aims in resenting the tragedy of Grimes self, and in most of its other haracterizations, which are not ock opera types. It is, at times, ather too detailed and somemes too literary, and, while the ain thread of the story is not st it is occasionally obscured: ere are discussions and philosohizings which seemed hard to roject across the fottlights. Such n impression gathered at a reearsal may be subject to later mendment, and the same reserration should be made about imressions of the music. This tells a well defined creative indiiduality combined with a sense the theater. There is variety style, but no sense of derivaeness.

Benjamin Britten

Composer of the opera "Peter Grimes," which was presented at Tanglewood last night by the Berkshire Music Center

Not Doctrinaire Music

It is music of today which is not doctrinaire: it is consonant or dissonant, melodious or pungent, according to the demands of the dramatic situation.

Some of its tunes are readily rememberable, but on a first hearing the treatment of the ideas, rather than the musical ideas themselves, is a strong point of the score—the projections of dramatic emotion by skillful use, combination and contrasts of musical color and atmosphere. There are some static moments, but the development of a dramatic situation, sustained and increasing tension in a long approach to a climax, are among the features which make this score an unusual achievement.

It is most telling in the writing for the orchestra and the chorus and also in the use of these as a background or contrast for the singing of the soloists. The solo writing can often be described as recitative of an elastic type, varying from conversation at one end to what is nearly an aria at the other, as in the sustained solos of Ellen and Grimes. The text is not always easy to sing, and the solo music, while often eloquent, is at times exacting. In his distinguished writing for the soloists, Mr. Britten has not always solved the problems involved; elsewhere his solutions are distinctly successful.

But the work as a whole is an English opera of a new kind, nationally as well as personally individual, and its future in this country is to be awaited with much interest.

It will be repeated tomorrow with some changes of cast, including Joseph Laderoute as Grimes, Frances Yeend as Ellen, Robert Long as Boles, Duane Crossley as Swallow and Irene Jordan as Mrs. Sedley. All seats are already taken both for tomorrow and a third performance on Friday night.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 7 - 1946

BRITTEN'S 'GRIMES' UNVEILED AT LENOX

New Opera in American Debut at Tanglewood Festival—Bernstein Is Conductor

By OLIN DOWNES

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 6—"Peter Grimes," the opera by the librettist, Montagu Slater, and the composer, Benjamin Britten, designated by Serge Koussevitzky before the curtain as the opera that came "first after Carmen," was given its American première by the students' orchestra, chorus and soloists of the Berkshire Music Center this evening in the Opera Concert Theatre at Tanglewood.

The performance was conducted by Leonard Bernstein, who had as collaborators Eric Crozier and Frederick Cohen, stage directors; Richard Rychtarik, stage designer; Hugh Ross, choral director, and Boris Goldowsky, director of the opera department. Mr. Britten had come from London to attend this production, supervised dramatically by Mr. Crozier, who had directed the world première of the work at Sadlers Wells on June 7.

It is known that this score had been commissioned of Mr. Britten by Dr. Koussevitzky, representing the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation which he established in memory of his late wife, Natalie Koussevitzky, to whom the opera is dedicated. Mr. Britten had said to Dr. Koussevitzky: "This opera is yours." Dr. Koussevitzky related his reply: "No, this opera belongs to the world." He said finally that he had been asked to remind the audience that the performers at this première were students.

A Brilliant Performance

The performance of a modern and very difficult score was astonishingly brilliant on the part of the orchestra, the chorus and, in the sum of it, the gifted and intelligent solo interpreters, whose sincerity was contagious. The cast consisted of William Horne, as Peter Grimes; Florence Manning, as Ellen Orford; James Pease, Captain Balstrode; Ellen Carleen, as Auntie, landlady of "The Boar"; Mildred Mueller and Phyllis Smith, as the nieces of Auntie, and main attractions of the inn; Robert Grey, as Ned Keene; Paul Frank, as Bob Boles; Leonard Trench, as Swallow, the lawyer; Frances Lehnerts, as Mrs. Nabob Sidney; Paul Knowles, as the Rev. Horace Adams; Byron Kelley, as Dr. Thorp, and Matthew Lockhart, as Hobson, the carrier.

The story of the opera is a grim one. It is fashioned in verse from tales, likewise told in verse, taken from the rhymed cycle "The Borough," by George Crabbe, the clergyman-poet of the early nineteenth century in England. Crabbe never had a wide popularity, yet Walter Scott knew his verses by memory and Thomas Hardy was strongly influenced by his realism. Crabbe knew the people of whom he wrote, and, from his own hard youth, the frustrations and vicissitudes of poverty.

The opera has been designated as one not easy to estimate from the traditional standpoint. That is true, so true that one asks whether in actual fact it is an opera at all. For despite its famed realism, mostly lugged in for theatrical purposes sometimes realized and sometimes naively mishandled, it is nearer a dramatic oratorio with stage settings than it is to a living, breathing music drama. Oh, yes, there are chattering fisher-folk, and some boozing, fighting and dancing by trulls and drunkards on the stage. And of course doors fly and windows fly open in the wind, and people come in dripping or drunk as the case may be. They quarrel. And for comic relief there are the nieces and auntie, no better than they should be, scolding or cavorting about. One man draws a knife and another whacks a drum in order to lead a formal procession of peasants, duly armed with clubs, to beat up the fisherman.

The real story is inside the music, and is conveyed principally by the orchestra and chorus. Its individual characters are hardly real, with the exception of one, Peter Grimes. The rest are star figures, who have no genuine characterization either in the libretto or the music. They are background to throw Grimes into relief and have no organic life of their own. Even Ellen is an effigy, and her principal song one of the poorest pages in the piece. The libretto is more literary than theatrical, more symbolic and psychological than realistic. The drama is not one of individuals, but of man, in his dreams and his pride, pitted against fate and the sea.

But the score is astonishing, first in its integrated, over-all structure, of which no part is a mere accessory of the main idea. The motives or phrases of chorus, principals and orchestra are all bound together, sometimes in free symphonic fashion, but more often in ways that are singularly classic and formal in design. To the orchestra, to be sure, is given a freer role, especially in the four symphonic interludes, when it supplies mood and eerie voices of the storm.

This is more music than theatre, though it amounts to dramatic expression by a composer who knows well his Mussorgsky, Berg and Sibelius, whose technic is dazzling and so brilliant that one is never precisely sure, at first hearings of the music, where the technic ends and the genuine and expression of feeling begins.

There are passages, like the quartet in three parts of ladies in the last act, which seem a little incongruous with the content. It must be admitted that the lyrical phrase, which exposes character or feeling as they are instantaneously and unforgettably expressed for example by the opening phrase of "Tristan" or the motive of just seven notes in which Bizet in "Carmen" lays bare the jealousy of José's soul, are mostly conspicuous by their absence. It is an eclectic, highly organized modern score. The harmonic bite and the vivid colors of the orchestra, sometimes black, sometimes wild and shrill, and now and again of prismatic brilliance, go far toward supplying the sonorous accentuation than the situations need, and there is more than intimation of the sounds and terrors of the sea.

The thematic unity is emphasized by the recurrence in the final scene of motives heard at the beginning, as again the people mend their nets and greet the day. Peter Grimes, a momentary pinpoint on the cosmic horizon, has gone, and the folk resume their way. Mr. Britten might say that the impersonality and objectivity of his pages are precisely justified by the symbolism of his tale and may be taken as reflection of the nature that he knows well. He, too, was born by the sea.

At any rate, this opera is a prodigious advance, in form, technic and integration of its elements, over the one work of his in dramatic form, the chamber opera, "Paul Bunyan," that was heard in 1941 in New York. "Peter Grimes" is the work of a composer, 33, still at the threshold of his powers, whose latest opera, "The Rape of Lucrece" is mentioned from authoritative sources as a further conspicuous advance. A young composer who can go so fast and so far so soon is one to be watched respectfully.

TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER

AUG 7 - 1946

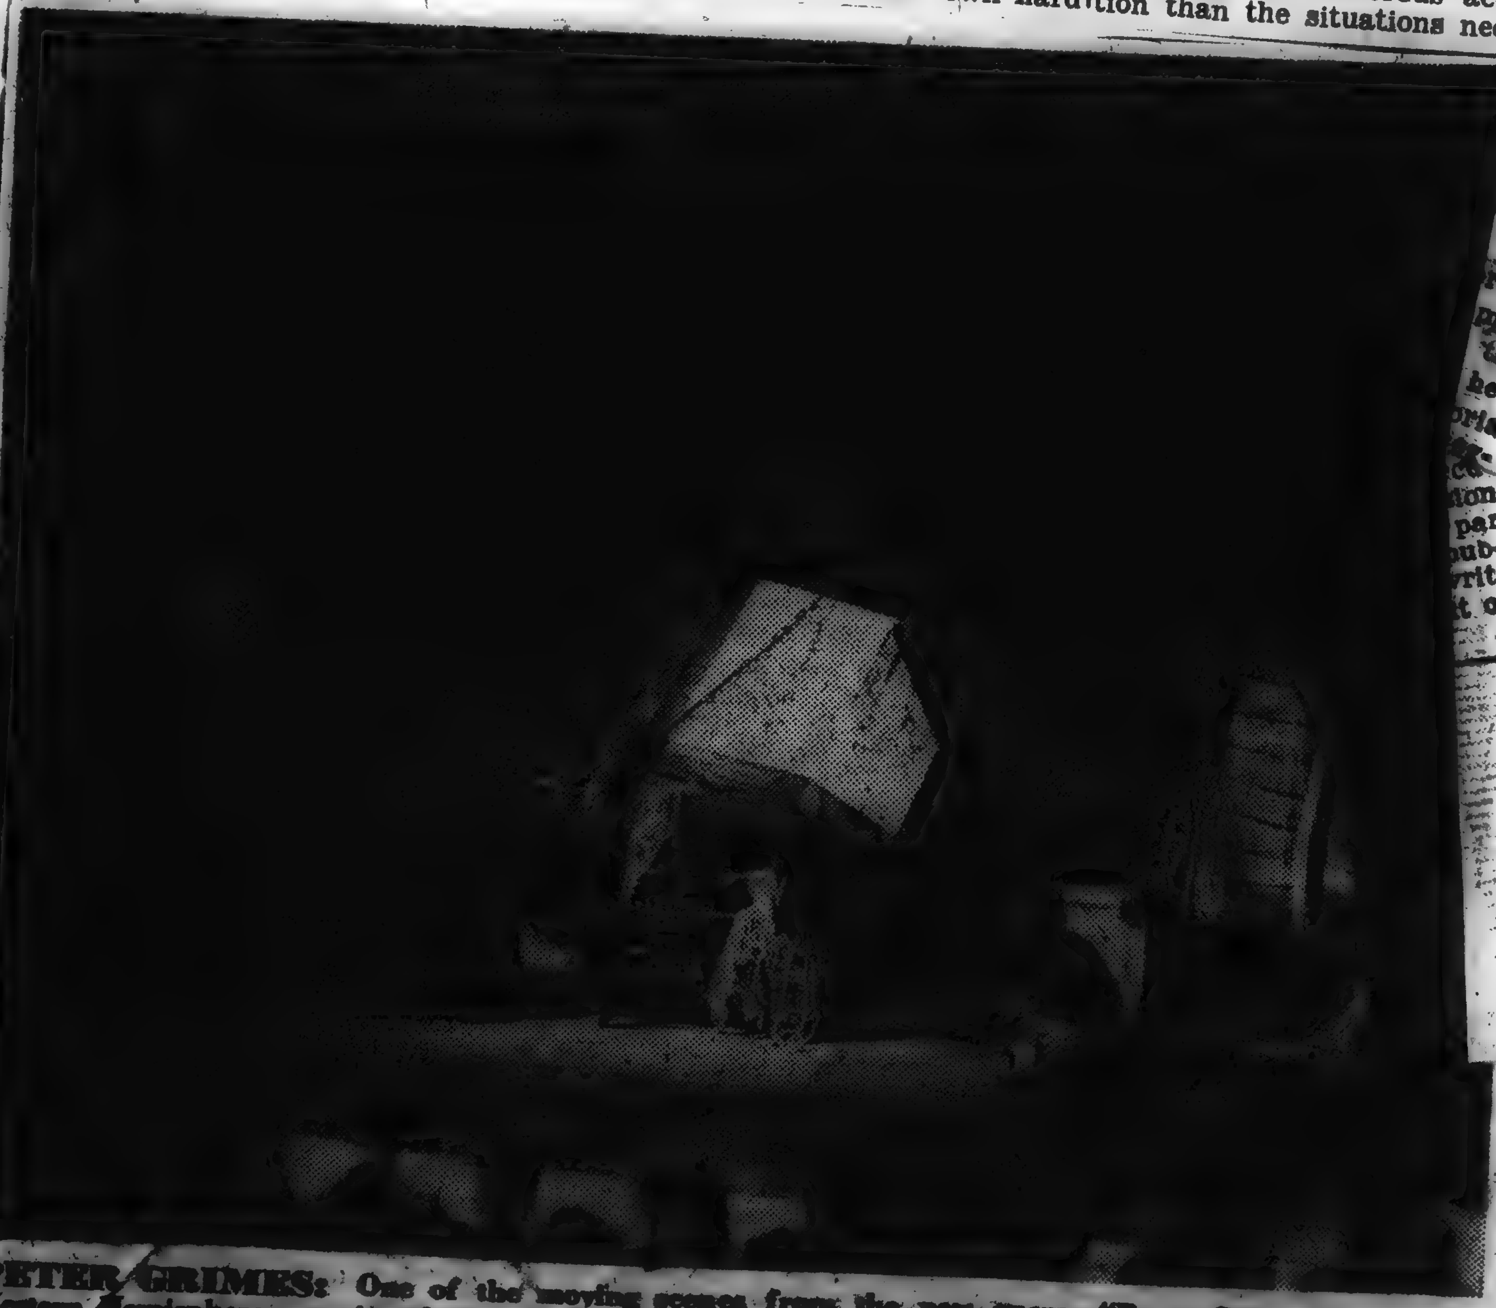
Closing Events At Tanglewood

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 7 — With the first western hemisphere performance of Benjamin Britten's, opera, "Peter Grimes," last night, the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood entered upon its last and busiest week. Fourteen events will be open to friends of the center and the public within the next six days.

Opera scenes by the opera workshop are planned for Thursday afternoon at 3:30 and Saturday at 2:30. They will be presented in the formal garden if weather permits; in the chamber music hall if it is wet. Friday evening "Peter Grimes" will be repeated.

On Thursday afternoon at 4:30 department 5 orchestra will give a symphony concert and on Friday at 2:15 department 2 orchestra will play. Olin Downes, New York Times music editor, will give the last of four lectures on "The Art of Criticism" Friday at 4:30. The last event by students of the school will be a chamber music concert by department 2 group Sunday morning at 10:30.

The final series of festival concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky will be Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon. There will be a public rehearsal for the benefit of the pension fund Saturday morning at 10.



PETER GRIMES: One of the moving scenes from the new opera, "Peter Grimes," given its Western Hemisphere premiere last night at Tanglewood. Peter, played by William Horne, is shown in his cabin where he has brought his apprentice, Frederic Zighera.

46—7

shire County Eagle, Wednesday, Aug. 7, 1946 ★★

ser Britten, Local Clerk Finish, Neck and Neck

s premiere day for itten, English com- pera "Peter Grimes" publicly for the first ight at Tanglewood and re as a United States patron was held earlier The latter experience a little more trying.

afternoon Britten and nd, a contemporary, local men's clothing ve shall call Rosen- that's the name of uest of shirts. (Who rs?). What's more, stomed to Ameri- fitting, had to ask for shirt size.

rett put the tape cian's neck rather sual routine, with one size to the ated on the tape. gulped Britten, applying that of strength?"

"What I usually do," answered Brett facetiously, "is pull it tight until I see the customer get blue in the face."

"Well, that's quite interesting," the composer countered. "What shade of blue do you look for?"

Aug 7 Globe

Fiedler Knows Best

To the Editor—Your reader who criticizes the Pops programs does not realize that there are many people in Boston who enjoy listening to the light, refreshing excerpts from the great musicals of Cole Porter, Irving Berlin and others. This is the music of the people who attend the Pops concerts night after night; the numbers are carefully selected by Mr. Arthur Fiedler, whose knowledge of music must exceed that of your outspoken reader.

HORACE A. JOHNSON.
Waltham.

P. S.—My definition of "Pops," from the Latin "populus," is: the people.

[242]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

AUG 7 - 1946

Music

'Peter Grimes' Hailed in Berkshire Bow

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Robert Bagar.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 7.—The American premiere of Benjamin Britten's three-act opera "Peter Grimes" took place in the theater concert hall at Tanglewood last night before a capacity audience of specially invited guests. The occasion was gala, musico-social in both appearance and fact. One noticed many bright stars of the operatic and concert firmament among the listeners. It was an excellent show that the Berkshire Festival afforded us, a show to satisfy our interest in doings musical and of news and of the social scene.

"Peter Grimes" was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in 1941, and the score is dedicated to the memory of Natalie Koussevitzky. The work was completed in 1945, the libretto is by Montagu Slater, based on a poem by George Crabbe.

It was given its first performance at the Sadler's Wells Theater London, on June 7, 1945. Since then it has been given in various European cities, and excerpts of the score have been performed in concert both abroad and in this country (with particular reference to the Boston Symphony's performances).

Tonight and Friday.

In November of last year some scenes from the work were done in New York at the studio of Mrs. Clytie Mundy, a distinguished voice teacher, although these, of course, may not be regarded as an American premiere.

The piece was prepared for the Berkshire hearings, of which there will be three, all told, including tonight's and Friday's by a group of noted workers in the operatic vineyard and environs. These include Leonard Bernstein, who conducted, Eric Crozier (who staged the work in London) and Frederic Cohen, both in charge of staging, Hugh Ross, responsible for the choral work, and Boris Goldovsky, director of the opera department, Berkshire Music Center. Richard Rychtarik did the sets.

The crowning gem of this new opera is its score, a pulsing, vibrant, exciting musical expression of the drama by a man we may immediately accept as a natural writer for the lyric theater. From the prologue, through three acts, which are separated by musical interludes, the speech of the orchestra is positive and forceful and always absorbing.

Sustained by the Score.

Mr. Britten, who was present for the premiere, is not only a master deviser of dramatic situations, whether or not the libretto supplied them, but also a remarkably sensitive prosodist, one of whose chief aims, it very evidently appears was to make the text as clear as possible. In achieving this clarity he yet made no compromise with his own creative urge, so smooth and so spontaneous does the music flow.

The composer's accomplishment is the greater because the story tends often enough to fall apart. It is stretched beyond endurance, sometimes, but always the music rushes in to keep interest alive in the proceedings.

Fuller details of the work itself will be furnished at a later date, because space, at the moment, is rapidly vanishing.

The Cast at Premiere.

In the well-trained cast—quite a miracle, since the rehearsing has not been going for a very long time—the most compelling performer was James Pease, who impersonated Capt. Balstrode. Florence Manning, the Ellen, also labored creditably, as did William Horne in the title role. The part of Peter, by the way, calls for the versatility to be found only in an ideal of ideals actor singer. That Mr. Horne did as well as he did, despite some fluffed high tones, is to his credit.

Ned Keene was sung by Robert Gay; Auntie, by Ellen Carleen, the Nieces, by Mildred Mueller and Phyllis Smith; Swallow, by Paul Frankel and Reverend Adams, by Paul Knowles.

Mr. Bernstein did a noble job conducting the difficult score. The chorus sang well, for the most part. The sets were excellent.

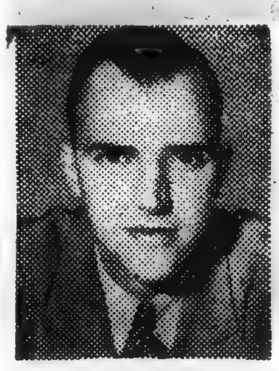
As for the plot, which is a quasi-psychological tour-de-force, it has to do with a common fisherman, Peter, who is accused of murdering one, then a second apprentice, and his persecution by a motley group of hussies, harlots, goody goodies and quite respectable people. He ends by being driven to his watery death, under the mounting impact of accusation.

The libretto lacks integration enough to keep pace with the superb music. And sometimes, too, Britten, in his relentless search for clear verbal expression, has made rather high-falutin' lines too prominent in the scheme.

There was an ovation for all concerned.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

AUG 7 - 1946



Words and Music

Britten's 'Peter Grimes' Hits You Between the Eyes

By John Briggs

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 6—Benjamin Britten's new opera, "Peter Grimes," which had its first American performance at the Berkshire Music Center tonight, is the damnedest thing I have ever seen.

It is not an opera. It is a violent explosion of raw emotion, false and melodramatic for the most part, lumped into an incoherent mass and flung in the face of the audience. After seeing it I felt as if I were the stooge in a burlesque routine and had been beaten over the head with a bladder all evening.

And yet—in its lurid three acts of stage mayhem is wrapped up something else. It may turn out to be the kernel of the most original and most significant operatic talent of our day.

At this point it is hard to tell. Everything about "Peter Grimes" is confused. The music, the stage action and all the characters are confused. Last night I was confused; even with a libretto I found it hard at times to discover what was going on.

Impossible Script

Mr. Britten has hitched his muse to an impossible and unworkable script. Peter Grimes, the central character, is an unbelievable stage figure. He is at once a sadistic beast and a gentle, considerate lover; an impractical visionary and a shrewd commercial fisherman; a skilled, daring mariner and a timid introvert. Nothing in his character forms a consistent pattern. He is, in short, a lunatic, the least satisfactory of all theatre heroes. You are never surprised at anything he does, because he is clearly capable of anything.

Continued on Page 15.

There is too much emphasis on relatively minor characters who play only an incidental part in the drama. The drama, in fact, suggests all too clearly its origin as a patchwork of reflective vignettes, woven not too deftly, and for reasons that remain obscure, into a sort of narrative.

In his music Mr. Britten reveals shortcomings that may prove embarrassing if he continues his operatic ventures. Foremost is his conception of the human voice as a four-octave instrument of unlimited power, coupled to an infinitely extensible pair of lungs. Some of the music he projected for the tenor part must absolutely be classified as cruel and unusual punishment.

Words Badly Set

Mr. Britten often sets words badly, another serious fault in the earnest composer of opera. His score abounds in false accents, in phrases that have musical logic but are out of joint with the verse. (Sample: "welCOME the HOUR . . . beat YOUR tired ARMS.") That is neither good opera nor good verse.

A third flaw is that Mr. Britten's score lacks balance, variety, contrast. Mr. Britten punches too hard. "Peter Grimes" is a smash second act curtain all the way through. The effect is at first electrifying, then deadly. Even a hurricane gets monotonous if you are in it long enough.

But with all these crudities of technique, which stamp him as an operatic novice, Mr. Britten is a gifted novice. His music is dramatic; and that is, I think, something that cannot be acquired or learned. And when he lucks his way into a good stage situation he plays it for all it is worth. There are moments of superb musical drama, such as the first meeting with the apprentice which closes Act 1, scattered all through the score.

"Peter Grimes" is the young English composer's first opera. Despite its many shortcomings it is a provocative beginning.

Smooth Performance

The performance tonight represented weeks of toil on the part of musicians and stage technicians, and was mechanically all the composer could have wished. The two principal singers, Florence Manning and William Horne, showed in their singing the wear and tear of too much rehearsal. As a long time admirer of Mr. Horne's vocalism, I can only wish for him the speediest possible return to Italian opera.

Top vocal honors went to the baritone department, I thought, with Robert Gay and James Pease outstanding in the over-size cast.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS

AUG 7 - 1946

'Peter Grimes' Has Operatic Greatness In Lenox Premiere

By DOUGLAS WATT

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 6.—"Peter Grimes" has greatness. The American premiere of Benjamin Britten's new opera last night at the Berkshire Music Center here was a startling and rewarding occasion.

Strange excitement and beauty burst from the orchestra and stage with such rapidity that listening became a breathtaking pleasure. "Grimes" speaks with a direct and original language, dramatic to the hilt. It is an opera for our time, brilliantly conceived and executed.

William Horne

The story takes place in a small English fishing village early in the last century, and is concerned with one of the most fascinating characters in opera—a tortured, introspective and sadistic fisherman whose maltreatment of boy apprentices is the talk of the town.

It ends with the manhood and Grimes' escape to the sea, where he sinks his boat and himself.

Horne Sings Lead.

The first American cast was an exceptionally fine one. William Horne sang the inhumanly difficult tenor role of Grimes, and made the figure both pitiful and tragic. Florence Manning, in the warmly sympathetic soprano role of a local schoolmistress, sang with great beauty, and acted with a mature understanding of the part. James Pease in the baritone part of a retired skipper also distinguished himself.

The many numerous and individual other parts were also splendidly performed.

Leonard Bernstein conducted the all-student orchestra and he knew his job thoroughly. His musicians responded to his direction superbly and with bright intelligence.

The chorus, directed by Hugh Ross, was a good spot above most opera choruses. The stage settings and lighting were only adequate.

It may, on first thought, seem a pity to have to go to Lenox to witness an event such as this, but there is justice in it. On Broadway, if Eddie Dowling goes through with his stated plan of trying to make a run of "Grimes," it will be met with much intolerance and displeasure by audiences unprepared for its surprising magnificences. But here at Tanglewood, the first audience was loving and enthusiastic. Britten and Montagu Slater, who wrote the strong and lovely libretto, deserve no less.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

AUG 7 - 1946

'PETER GRIMES' OPERA IS HEARD

Britten Opus Gets American Premiere at Tanglewood.

By IRVING KOLODIN.
Special to THE NEW YORK SUN.

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 7.—Whoever persuaded Benjamin Britten to call his setting of "Peter Grimes" an opera was dealing in understatement as well as flattery. Its first American performance here last night suggested, at its best, the young Englishman's writing transcends what is ordinarily heard from orchestra and chorus in an opera house, but in its minute-by-minute progress it is more often a drain on the attention, and a trial to the patience.

Britten's treatment of Montague Slater's adaption of a poem by George Crabbe has a special relationship to Tanglewood. For it was written on a commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and dedicated to the late wife of the conductor. It was hardly surprising, therefore, that Koussevitzky made an unexpected appearance on the stage before the performance began. To laud the work which the audience was about to hear and proclaim that its only predecessor in musical drama was "Carmen."

This is a comparison that may well be forgotten at once. For, with all the skill of Britten in handling a large orchestra, chorus and numerous solo voices, it is precisely in the realm of melodic interest that the work is deficient. At a first hearing there was more that possessed promise of durability in the orchestral "Interludes" that dot the work, especially the superb storm music of the first act and the scene at Grimes's hut in the second.

Substance of Story.

Either because of the way it was treated or because of its intrinsic matter, I found little that was absorbing in the doleful tale of the fisherman Grimes. He begins as a prisoner at the bar charged with responsibility for the death of a young apprentice on his boat; and the substance of the drama concerns the fate of a later apprentice. Since the story has been in circulation for 136 years, I am revealing no secret in disclosing that this youth also drowns under questionable circumstances. When the half-crazed, half-mystic Grimes confronts his dilemma, he concludes that drowning himself at sea is the most attractive solution.

A problem that plagued William Horne, who sang the part of Grimes (and which will probably pursue more of his successors) is the high range of the part, whether it was written with Peter Pears in mind. I do not know, but that exceptional Englishman (who created the title role in London last year) is one of the few who could deal with it on even terms. Horne acted his part with stock dramatic gestures, and when he was not pressed too hard by the cruel requirements of music, sang it capably.

Easily the most compelling performance on the stage was that of James Pease who carried himself well as Capt. Balstrode and also sang eloquently. The principal female role of Ellen Orford was admirably interpreted by Florence Manning. Most of the minor roles were sung by students of the Berkshire Music Center who responded splendidly to the unrelenting baton of Leonard Bernstein, as did the excellent orchestral players of the school. The composer was present in a seat adjacent to Koussevitzky's and seemed pleased with what he heard.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

AUG 7 - 1946

Music

'Peter Grimes' Hailed in Berkshire Bow

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 7.—The American premiere of Benjamin Britten's three-act opera "Peter Grimes" took place in the theater concert hall at Tanglewood last night before a capacity audience of specially invited guests. The occasion was gala, musico-social in both appearance and fact. One noticed many bright stars of the operatic and concert firmament among the listeners. It was an excellent show that the Berkshire Festival afforded us, a show to satisfy our interest in doings musical and of news and of the social scene.

Robert Bagar.

"Peter Grimes" was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in 1941, and the score is dedicated to the memory of Natalie Koussevitzky. The work was completed in 1945, the libretto is by Montagu Slater, based on a poem by George Crabbe.

It was given its first performance at the Sadler's Wells Theater London, on June 7, 1945. Since then it has been given in various European cities, and excerpts of the score have been performed in concert both abroad and in this country (with particular reference to the Boston Symphony's performances).

Tonight and Friday.

In November of last year some scenes from the work were done in New York at the studio of Mrs. Clytie Mundy, a distinguished voice teacher, although these, of course, may not be regarded as an American premiere.

The piece was prepared for the Berkshire hearings, of which there will be three, all told, including tonight's and Friday's by a group of noted workers in the operatic vineyard and environs. These include Leonard Bernstein, who conducted, Eric Crozier (who staged the work in London) and Frederic Cohen, both in charge of staging, Hugh Ross, responsible for the choral work, and Boris Goldovsky, director of the opera department, Berkshire Music Center. Richard Rychtarik did the sets.

The crowning gem of this new opera is its score, a pulsing, vibrant, exciting musical expression of the drama by a man we may immediately accept as a natural writer for the lyric theater. From the prologue, through three acts, which are separated by musical interludes, the speech of the orchestra is positive and forceful and always absorbing.

Sustained by the Score.

Mr. Britten, who was present for the premiere, is not only a master deviser of dramatic situations, whether or not the libretto supplied them, but also a remarkably sensitive prosodist, one of whose chief aims, it very evidently appears was to make the text as clear as possible. In achieving this clarity he yet made no compromise with his own creative urge, so smooth and so spontaneous does the music flow.

The composer's accomplishment is the greater because the story tends often enough to fall apart. It is stretched beyond endurance sometimes, but always the music rushes in to keep interest alive in the proceedings.

Fuller details of the work itself will be furnished at a later date, because space, at the moment, is rapidly vanishing.

The Cast at Premiere.

In the well-trained cast—quite a miracle, since the rehearsing has not been going for a very long time—the most compelling performer was James Pease, who impersonated Capt. Balstrode. Florence Manning, the Ellen, also labored creditably, as did William Horne in the title role. The part of Peter, by the way, calls for the versatility to be found only in an ideal of ideals actor singer. That Mr. Horne did as well as he did, despite some fluffed high tones, is to his credit.

Ned Keene was sung by Robert Gay; Auntie, by Ellen Carleen, the Nieces, by Mildred Mueller and Phyllis Smith; Swallow, by Paul Frankel and Reverend Adams, by Paul Knowles.

Mr. Bernstein did a noble job conducting the difficult score. The chorus sang well, for the most part. The sets were excellent.

As for the plot, which is a quasi-psychological tour-de-force, it has to do with a common fisherman, Peter, who is accused of murdering one, then a second apprentice, and his persecution by a motley group of hussies, harlots, goody goodies and quite respectable people. He ends by being driven to his watery death, under the mounting impact of accusation.

The libretto lacks integration enough to keep pace with the superb music. And sometimes, too, Britten, in his relentless search for clear verbal expression, has made rather high-falutin' lines too prominent in the scheme.

There was an ovation for all concerned.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS

AUG 7 - 1946

'Peter Grimes' Has Operatic Greatness In Lenox Premiere

By DOUGLAS WATT

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 6.—"Peter Grimes" has greatness. The American premiere of Benjamin Britten's new opera last night at the Berkshire Music Center here was a startling and rewarding occasion.

Strange excitement and beauty burst from the orchestra and stage with such rapidity that listening became a breathtaking pleasure. "Grimes" speaks with a direct and original language, dramatic to the hilt. It is an opera for our time, brilliantly conceived and executed.

William Horne

The story takes place in a small English fishing village early in the last century, and is concerned with one of the most fascinating characters in opera—a tortured, introspective and sadistic fisherman whose maltreatment of boy apprentices is the talk of the town.

It ends with the manhood and Grimes' escape to the sea, where he sinks his boat and himself.

Horne Sings Lead.

The first American cast was an exceptionally fine one. William Horne sang the inhumanly difficult tenor role of Grimes, and made the figure both pitiful and tragic. Florence Manning, in the warmly sympathetic soprano role of a local schoolmistress, sang with great beauty, and acted with a mature understanding of the part. James Pease in the baritone part of a retired skipper also distinguished himself.

The many numerous and individual other parts were also splendidly performed.

Leonard Bernstein conducted the all-student orchestra and he knew his job thoroughly. His musicians responded to his direction superbly and with bright intelligence.

The chorus, directed by Hugh Ross, was a good spot above most opera choruses. The stage settings and lighting were only adequate.

It may, on first thought, seem a pity to have to go to Lenox to witness an event such as this, but there is justice in it. On Broadway, if Eddie Dowling goes through with his stated plan of trying to make a run of "Grimes," it will be met with much intolerance and displeasure by audiences unprepared for its surprising magnificences. But here at Tanglewood, the first audience was loving and enthusiastic. Britten and Montagu Slater, who wrote the strong and lovely libretto, deserve no less.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

AUG 7 - 1946

Words and Music

Britten's 'Peter Grimes' Hits You Between the Eyes

By John Briggs

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 6—Benjamin Britten's new opera, "Peter Grimes," which had its first American performance at the Berkshire Music Center tonight, is the damnedest thing I have ever seen.

It is not an opera. It is a violent explosion of raw emotion, false and melodramatic for the most part, lumped into an incoherent mass and flung in the face of the audience. After seeing it I felt as if I were the stooge in a burlesque routine and had been beaten over the head with a bladder all evening.

And yet—in its lurid three acts of stage mayhem is wrapped up something else. It may turn out to be the kernel of the most original and most significant operatic talent of our day.

At this point it is hard to tell. Everything about "Peter Grimes" is confused. The music, the stage action and all the characters are confused. Last night I was confused; even with a libretto I found it hard at times to discover what was going on.

Impossible Script

Mr. Britten has hitched his muse to an impossible and unworkable script. Peter Grimes, the central character, is an unbelievable stage figure. He is at once a sadistic beast and a gentle, considerate lover; an impractical visionary and a shrewd commercial fisherman; a skilled, daring mariner and a timid introvert. Nothing in his character forms a consistent pattern. He is, in short, a lunatic, the least satisfactory of all theatre heroes. You are never surprised at anything he does, because he is clearly capable of anything.

Continued on Page 15

There is too much emphasis on relatively minor characters who play only an incidental part in the drama. The drama, in fact, suggests all too clearly its origin as a patchwork of reflective vignettes, woven not too deftly, and for reasons that remain obscure, into a sort of narrative.

In his music Mr. Britten reveals shortcomings that may prove embarrassing if he continues his operatic ventures. Foremost is his conception of the human voice as a four-octave instrument of unlimited power, coupled to an infinitely extensible pair of lungs. Some of the music he projected for the tenor part must absolutely be classified as cruel and unusual punishment.

Words Badly Set

Mr. Britten often sets words badly, another serious fault in the earnest composer of opera. His score abounds in false accents, in phrases that have musical logic but are out of joint with the verse. (Sample: "welCOME the HOUR . . . beat YOUR tired ARMS.") That is neither good opera nor good verse.

A third flaw is that Mr. Britten's score lacks balance, variety, contrast. Mr. Britten punches too hard. "Peter Grimes" is a smash second act curtain all the way through. The effect is at first electrifying, then deadly. Even a hurricane gets monotonous if you are in it long enough.

But with all these crudities of technique, which stamp him as an operatic novice, Mr. Britten is a gifted novice. His music is dramatic; and that is, I think, something that cannot be acquired or learned. And when he lucks his way into a good stage situation he plays it for all it is worth. There are moments of superb musical drama, such as the first meeting with the apprentice which closes Act 1, scattered all through the score.

"Peter Grimes" is the young English composer's first opera. Despite its many shortcomings it is a provocative beginning.

Smooth Performance

The performance tonight represented weeks of toil on the part of musicians and stage technicians, and was mechanically all the composer could have wished. The two principal singers, Florence Manning and William Horne, showed in their singing the wear and tear of too much rehearsal. As a long time admirer of Mr. Horne's vocalism, I can only wish for him the speediest possible return to Italian opera.

Top vocal honors went to the baritone department, I thought, with Robert Gay and James Pease outstanding in the oversize cast.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

AUG 7 - 1946

'PETER GRIMES' OPERA IS HEARD

Britten Opus Gets American Premiere at Tanglewood.

By IRVING KOLODIN.
Special to THE NEW YORK SUN.

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 7.—Whoever persuaded Benjamin Britten to call his setting of "Peter Grimes" an opera was dealing in understatement as well as flattery. Its first American performance here last night suggested, at its best, the young Englishman's writing transcends what is ordinarily heard from orchestra and chorus in an opera house, but in its minute-by-minute progress it is more often a drain on the attention, and a trial to the patience.

Britten's treatment of Montague Slater's adaption of a poem by George Crabbe has a special relationship to Tanglewood. For it was written on a commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and dedicated to the late wife of the conductor. It was hardly surprising, therefore, that Koussevitzky made an unexpected appearance on the stage before the performance began. To laud the work which the audience was about to hear and proclaim that its only predecessor in musical drama was "Carmen."

This is a comparison that may well be forgotten at once. For, with all the skill of Britten in handling a large orchestra, chorus and numerous solo voices, it is precisely in the realm of melodic interest that the work is deficient. At a first hearing there was more that possessed promise of durability in the orchestral "Interludes" that dot the work, especially the superb storm music of the first act and the scene at Grimes's hut in the second.

Substance of Story.

Either because of the way it was treated or because of its intrinsic matter, I found little that was absorbing in the doleful tale of the fisherman Grimes. He begins as a prisoner at the bar charged with responsibility for the death of a young apprentice on his boat; and the substance of the drama concerns the fate of a later apprentice. Since the story has been in circulation for 136 years, I am revealing no secret in disclosing that this youth also drowns under questionable circumstances. When the half-crazed, half-mystic Grimes confronts his dilemma, he concludes that drowning himself at sea is the most attractive solution.

A problem that plagued William Horne, who sang the part of Grimes (and which will probably pursue more of his successors) is the high range of the part, whether it was written with Peter Pears in mind. I do not know, but that exceptional Englishman (who created the title role in London last year) is one of the few who could deal with it on even terms. Horne acted his part with stock dramatic gestures, and when he was not pressed too hard by the cruel requirements of music, sang it capably.

Easily the most compelling performance on the stage was that of James Pease who carried himself well as Capt. Balstrode and also sang eloquently. The principal female role of Ellen Orford was admirably interpreted by Florence Manning. Most of the minor roles were sung by students of the Berkshire Music Center who responded splendidly to the unrelenting baton of Leonard Bernstein, as did the excellent orchestral players of the school. The composer was present in a seat adjacent to Koussevitzky's and seemed pleased with what he heard.

GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS
COURIER
8/8/46

Festival Program Thrills Thousands

Works of Johannes Brahms Played at Tanglewood

Interpretations of Scores by Serge Koussevitzky and Renditions by Boston Symphony and Soloists Draw Great Applause.— Eleven Events This Week-end

By Harold E. Thompson

The fourth program of the Berkshire Music Festival and the first of the series B devoted entirely to the works of Johannes Brahms, opened Thursday evening under stormy skies but a big audience was on hand, filling the shed and the benches around the promenade circle under the shed.

The Tragic Overture with its rich harmonization and exalted mood was the first on the program and made a fitting prelude to the magnificent pianoforte concerto No. 1 in D minor with Claudio Arrau, the brilliant South American pianist, as soloist.

The concerto opens in a majestic manner which continues throughout. Mr. Arrau displayed prodigious technique and rode the crest of the wave in the passages where the full length of the great orchestra prevailed. The adagio movement brought forth a serenely inspired melody announced by the piano, the orchestra weaving its web of glowing harmonies around it. The third movement, Rondo; Allegro non troppo, was played with great verve and brilliance, calling forth much applause for the soloist and Dr. Koussevitzky.

After the intermission the famous 4th Symphony in E minor wove its spell upon the great audience. Entrancing melodies weave their golden threads through the magnificent tapestry of sound until the whole glitters in an aurora borealis of tonal splendor. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the marvelous score brought forth tremendous applause.

A great audience of Brahms' devotees gathered at Tanglewood Saturday evening for the second concert in the all Brahms series. An orange crescent moon glowed in the west in the summer night. Dr. Koussevitzky chose Symphony No. 3 in F major as the opening number, played with great beauty of tone and in four movements, each of contrasting beauty. A beautiful oboe solo and lovely effects by the string choir with a quiet ending of the last movement make this composition a memorable one.

Following intermission the wonderful Rhapsody for contralto solo, male chorus and orchestra with Carol Brice, soloist, thrilled the assembled thousands. Miss Brice disclosed a luscious voice of great power and flexibility, taking with ease the difficult intervals and singing with great feeling and understanding. The male chorus, trained by Robert Shaw, sang with great effect, the result being a tonal picture of exquisite beauty, evoking great applause.

Symphony No. 2 in D major closed the program. The first movement, announced by the horns with pizzacato accompaniment of strings, was followed by the lovely adagio of sustained beauty with a beautiful horn solo. The ravishing melody of the third movement played by the woodwinds led into a brilliant interplay of the various instruments. The last movement, Allegro con spirito, with the horns brilliantly voicing the joyous mood, ended this great work on a triumphant note.

Sunday afternoon's concert completed the Brahms series and a vast throng assembled for the event. Variations on a Theme by Haydn opened the concert. A spirited opening, followed by a slower movement, serene and beautiful leading into a brilliant passage in march style with horns announcing the variation, followed by a graceful andante with muted strings and then a lovely andante con moto announced by the cellos led to a brilliant finale with drums and symbals.

After the Variations came the Concerto for violin and violincello with orchestra, soloists being Erica Morini, violin, and Gregor Piatigorsky, violincello. Both artists were in fine form and thrilled the audience with their great playing. The first movement, allegro, after a brief introduction by the orchestra, opens with a beautiful cello cadenza. The orchestral accompaniment is magnificent throughout and is played with great verve and splendor by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra. Inspired melodies, stunning crescendos with heavenly harmonic effects with the solo instruments reaching great heights of musical sublimity made the afternoon a thrilling experience.

The andante movement announced by the horns leads into the famous melody by the soloists and orchestra, followed by a passage of striking beauty woven in a gorgeous pattern of liveliness, ending in a final statement by the cello of the haunting melody.

The third and final movement, Vivace non troppo, after a quiet opening leading into a gay and bright passage soon leads into the full orcestra broken by quiet intervals with the violin and cello soloists shining through it all. Playing with great artistry, Miss Morini displayed dazzling technique and this applies to Mr. Piatigorsky also. It was a triumph for all concerned and deserved the great ovation which followed.

The marvelous C minor Symphony followed the intermission. This monumental composition with its transcendent themes and gorgeous harmonies was played with all the greatness of interpretation and skill that the famous conductor always evokes from his artists of the orchestra. Heard from the lawn on a perfect summer afternoon in an idyllic setting, it was a thrilling experience. A gentle breeze cooled the thousands outside the shed.

The exquisite second movement played with great feeling and beauty was followed by the Un-poco allegretto e grazioso of the third with strings, horns and woodwinds in lovely effects. The famous pizzacato of the strings introduced a brilliantly-dramatic passage leading into the lovely horn solo, repeated by the flutes and echoed by the full orchestra. The fourth was brought to a triumphant conclusion to which the vast audience responded with a great demonstration of appreciation for the magnificent playing of the orchestra and Dr . Koussevitzky's marvelous reading of the score.

The six weeks session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude at Tanglewood this week-end with 11 musical events. Most important will be the final three concerts by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky tonight and Saturday night at 8:15 and Sunday afternoon at 3:30, and tomorrow evening the third performance of the opera "Peter Grimes," which had its initial performance in the western hemisphere Tuesday before an audience that included music critics from New York, Boston and other distant cities.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

AUG 7 - 1946

Britten's 'Peter Grimes' Has American Premiere

Tanglewood Sees First U. S. Performance of English Opera Commissioned by Koussevitzky

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, Aug. 6—Another important milestone in the progress of opera in English was passed in the first American performance of Benjamin Britten's opera "Peter Grimes" at the Tanglewood, Berkshire Music center tonight. Although written as a commission from Serge Koussevitzky, the work has already been performed in England, Switzerland, Belgium and Sweden and next season will be presented in four other countries. Naturally the opera is performed in the language of these respective countries and not in the original language, as foreign operas are in this country.

In spite of certain shortcomings tonight's performance represented a significant achievement, for while Mr Britten is no genius, he is a composer of talent and above all, one with ideas. The latter were predominant tonight, and one was conscious of listening to a creation of the intellect rather than the emotions.

Sinister Story

The story of "Peter Grimes" is sinister and grim and Mr Britten has chosen a musical medium to underscore these qualities. There was a temporary respite from this in the last act with several verses of a simple ditty sung straight in the folksy manner, and a rather gentle "Good Night" chorus. There was an appealing lyric beauty in Grimes's aria in the hut scene of act II sung with the boy just before he goes to his death, as there was in Ellen's scene with the same boy in act I. But for the most part the orchestration is one of almost unrelieved dissonance, the crass cacophony of which, is at times overpowering.

But "Peter Grimes" is essentially good theater. The numerous scenes of mass action on the part of the chorus were well spaced and skillfully handled; when the orchestra quieted down, the dialog usually came through clearly, and the action seemed spontaneous and had continuity. It is the most difficult kind of an opera to produce, full of choruses abounding in tricky rhythms, with short repliques from various individuals, off stage choruses and drum beats hard to hear in the orchestra pit, and the handling of mass movement in a limited space.

Well Rehearsed

From the successful manner in which all of these demands were handled, it was obvious that much intensive rehearsing had gone into its preparation. Although the orchestra seemed much too loud most of the time, Leonard Bernstein in the pit, held his forces together admirably, approaching the frightfully difficult score with apparent sympathy. Hugh Ross accomplished wonders with the chorus as did Eric Crozier and Frederic Cohen, the stage managers, who were particularly successful in their spacing, action and general management of the large chorus. Richard Rychtarik's sets were simple, utilitarian, colorful and expressive of the grimness of the tragedy involved.

Having listened to the dress rehearsal last night as well as tonight's performance, enabled me to hear both casts of principals. Last night Joseph Laderoute sang "Peter." Since his recital in Springfield several years ago his voice has matured considerably. Having lost little of its lyric quality, it has greater volume and serves well the singers expansive operatic style. Histrionically he was always convincing. Frances Yeend, the "Ellen" reminded me of a young Jeritza both in appearance and the full youthful freshness of her voice. Hers was a conservative role with little in the way of action but she was always part of the picture. Tonight the same roles were sung by William Horne and Florence Manning.

Portrayed Ellen

Miss Manning portrayed the role of Ellen with charm displaying a lyric voice of pleasant quality, especially full in the upper range. Mr Horne has been heard in Springfield in oratorio. He seemed at home in the part of Peter, acting it well, but much of the role seemed to lie high, and unless he was singing full voiced he sounded fatigued.

The rich baritone of James Pease was effective in the role of Capt Balstrode; Frances Lehnerts and Irene Jordan were both successful as Mrs Sedley, their gossipy dialog getting across clearly enough to justify the cause of opera in English. Ellen Carleen was a colorful "Auntie" and Mildred Mueller and Phyllis Smith were two lively nieces with good voices. In fact all of the smaller roles were performed admirably.

Before the program Dr Koussevitzk spoke briefly, complimenting all wh had contributed to the opera's suc cess, particularly Benjamin Britte whose work he considered, as a dram second only to Carmen.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 8 - 1946

Final Tanglewood Concerts at Hand

Third and Last Series Opens Tonight — Concluding Concerts to be Given Saturday and Sunday.

The third and final series of Berkshire Festival concerts will open tonight at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony orchestra presenting a varied program under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

The program tonight will include Prokofieff's ninth symphony, Schumann's violoncello concerto in A minor, Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by Strauss. Gregor Piatigorsky will be the soloist for the concerto.

The two last concerts of the season will be given Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon.

A few seats in the music shed were available today for the concerts tonight and Saturday night, but only box seats were left for the final appearance of the orchestra Sunday afternoon.

Koussevitzky Surprised At Pelletier's Comments

Refers to Letter Addressed to Orchestra Trustees' Head as 'Biased' Interpretation of Museum Remarks

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, declared today that he was "surprised to find such biased interpretation and malevolence" regarding his brief talk at the Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield, Aug. 2.

The conductor was referring to a letter written to Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, by A. J. Pelletier of 137 Elm Street and published in The Eagle Wednesday. Mr. Pelletier in his letter asked for enlightenment of a remark made by Dr. Koussevitzky when he said the student orchestra at Tanglewood is as good as the Cleveland and Cincinnati orchestras. The conductor's statement follows:

I am surprised to find such biased interpretation and malevolence from a member of this community toward which I feel a close association. There can be no place for narrow viewpoint and smallness of conception where youth and the building of the musical future of America is concerned.

Indeed, I happened to mention the Cleveland and Cincinnati Orchestras as examples of the high artistic standards of two of our major symphony orchestras—a criterion for which we strive with our hand-picked students. Should I then take orchestras of lower standards as examples for our youth? Will they not in the nearest future become members and complete the ranks of most of our leading musical organizations?

I have no doubt that the correct meaning of my words, my boundless enthusiasm and encouragement to these wonderful young American musicians, would not escape the genuine understanding of the leaders of these two orchestras—men of high cultural background and outstanding artistic achievement. For they, too, would not fail to encourage the musical youth of this country in creating the cultural future in which these young people will play so vital a part.

SCRANTON, PA.
TIMES

AUG 9 - 1946

THESE DAYS By George E. Sokolsky

MATURE AMERICA

Ten thousand men, women and chilren gather under a big shed, day after day, at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., to listen to the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, play Brahms. Nobody forces anyone to attend the Berkshire Music Festival. But they come from every state in the United States as their license plates show. They come great distances to hear the masters in this mountain setting, under stars.

Great Barrington, Lee, Lenox, Stockbridge, sleepy New England towns in the Berkshires, suddenly become filled with music-loving crowds. The dirt roads, unused to heavy traffic, take on the problems of Fifth Avenue, cars moving at snail's pace, radiators boiling over, local constables directing the moving lines as best they can—but the crowds come. Each year more and more come, so many more that the great shed can no longer hold them and many bring blankets to sit on the grass.

And they come not for jazz, nor to view a so-called celebrity, nor to show their furs and diamonds, nor to have their pictures appear in the Rotogravure Sections of Sunday papers. It is an American audience where the local barber sits with the New York rich who Summer here. They come to listen to an uncompromising program of musical art, to hear at its best the masters—one year Brahms and Beethoven—another year Mozart—and always the works of aspiring American musicians, who here may have a first opportunity to be heard. Four hundred musical students attend the Tanglewood School during the Summer. Thousands of aspirants for musical achievement watch Koussevitzky rehearse the most perfect orchestra in the world.

Similar festivals have been held in other places in the world, but on Sunday afternoon, as I watched these 10,000 Americans, silent and absorbed, filling their souls with Brahms' First, played gloriously, I could not help recalling Mr. Ehrenburg's comments on American culture. This Russian tourist should have been taken to Tanglewood, where once Hawthorne wrote his tales, close to the house where Longfellow wrote his poetry. There among the haughty pines of unspoiled beauty, he would have caught a glimpse of the depth and seriousness of American cultural maturity. And he might have realized that these people paid their own fares, bought their own tickets, came because they wanted to; no one told them to come.

None of them were given tickets because they produced goods above quota, or did satisfactory party work, or were rewarded for competent espionage. They are free human beings who can listen, as they choose, to Koussevitzky or Fred Waring, to Brahms or Gershwin or Kerns or some hot-licks swing composer. They have free choice and they exercise it at will. And there is no government to interfere.

It is not only so with music but with everything. Who is to tell an American whether he is to read George Bernard Shaw or Erle Stanley Gardner, Shakespeare or Jiggs? Who is to weigh another man's taste or choice by standards other than his own? If President Truman were to say tomorrow that Mark Twain bores him— I am pitting one Missourian against another — the most usual response would be "So what?"

The fact that he is president does not make him a judge of another man's literature. We have no Thought Control Police in this country, no Gestapo, no NKVD, no all-knowing, all-seeing mighty mind that controls and dominates the spirit and will of an entire nation. Nor do we exclude writers, or burn books, or denounce music because some one says that some one is a Fascist. In fact, in this capitalist country, the Communist Howard Fast's book is advertised in all newspapers, and in America, which is essentially Christian, an atheist receives an order from the FCC establishing atheism as a proper subject for radio discussion in competition with God.

It is good to be free. It is a glorious, clean feeling to be able to go anywhere, to listen to anything, t see anything and anybody with police authorization. It is a w fully unusual freedom in graded age. It is Americ

(Copyright, 1946, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Aug 8

Piatigorsky Will Play Old Cello

250-Year-Old Stradivarius in Tonight's Event

When Gregor Piatigorsky performs the solo part in Schumann's violoncello concerto in A minor at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood tonight, he will play the 250-year-old Stradivarius cello that he recently purchased.

Made by Antonio Stradivari in Cremona, Italy, in 1669, the 'Lord Aylesford, as the cello is called, is one of 50 of the famous violins and violoncellos, and one of 10 still in perfect condition. Taken from Italy to London in 1780 and bought by Lord Aylesford, it was in private hands until 1941, when negotiations for its purchase were started with the owner's family by a New York dealer. Mr. Piatigorsky, who is head of the chamber music department at Berkshire Music Center, played it for the first time last Sunday in the Brahms double concerto for violin and violoncello. He will use it on his concert tours in the coming season.

Seats in various parts of the music shed remain for tonight's program, first of the third and final series and the seventh of the Festival. Admission to the grounds will be on sale at the box office three hours before the concert.

Student events at the school, open to members of the Society of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, include a concert by Department 5 orchestra, conducted by Richard Burgin, this afternoon at 4.30, a concert tomorrow afternoon at 2.15 by Department 2 orchestra, conducted by members of Serge Koussevitzky's conducting class; a fourth and final lecture by Olin Downes, New York Times music editor, on "The Art of Criticism" tomorrow at 4.30; and the third and final performance of "Peter Grimes" by the opera department tomorrow evening at 8.15.

The theatre-concert hall was filled for the second American performance of "Peter Grimes" last evening, and will be filled again tomorrow evening for the final Tanglewood performance.

Following is the program for tonight's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky:

Prokofieff—Symphony No. 5, Op. 100.
Schumann—Violoncello Concerto in A minor, Op. 129.
Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Rondo.

Soloist—Gregor Piatigorsky

ADMIRES OLD INSTRUMENT: The recently acquired 250-year-old Stradivarius cello by Gregor Piatigorsky will be played in solo at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, tonight. It is one of 10 of the aged instruments still in use.

OPERA REPEATED: Most of the characters in the opera, "Peter Grimes," whi second performance at the Tanglewood theatre-concert hall last night were on stage when t was taken during the third act. The assembled villagers are preparing to search out Grimes hear about the death of his apprentice boy. The opera will be given again Friday nig

---

THE ROVING REPORTER

By Rudolph Elie, Jr.

Aug 8

Tanglewood Festival an Inspiring Experience Despite Rain, Scarcity of Creature Comforts

TANGLEWOOD, Aug. 7—It had to rain of course. It always does at one time or another at Tanglewood where, if you get home without sacrificing two sizes of your clothing to shrinkage, you must consider yourself especially favored of the gods. But getting wet, not to mention getting room reservations, meals, transportation, tickets and a few mosquito bites, is a small price indeed to pay for a day or so at this musical Mecca.

As you have doubtless gathered, the festival and the music center have more than recovered from their wartime tentativeness. And now, a few days before the final concert series, it is little short of feverish.

The town and the grounds seethe with musicians, composers, conductors, singers, students, librettists, teachers, scenic designers, writers, artists, photographers, critics and people with wide-templed tortoise shell glasses. It is, there is no question, the place to come if you want to hear, talk, and eat music.

600 of the Elect

Altogether, including the 400 and several students at the center, the musicians of the Boston Symphony, the celebrities and all there must be nearly 600 highly musical people in the neighborhood. Everywhere you go you rub elbows with the musically elect. People like Luboschutz and Nemenoff, Gregor Piatigorsky, Gladys Swarthout, Boris Goldovsky, Leonard Bernstein and so on are all over the place while the visiting notables whisk in and out in long, sleek cars to the vast delight of the public which prowls about on the green wondering who is who.

During the day sounds of practising and rehearsing spring out from behind every bush and in a 10-minute walk about the grounds, you can hear orchestra, opera, quartet, brass, choir, organ, woodwind octet, piano, fiddle, or voice, one at a time or all together, depending on where you stand. And late at night, after the concert is over, you can repair to the tavern in the town and sit around congratulating your friends, discussing your enemies, and speculating on what those blasted critics will have to say tomorrow morning.

It is all very disarming and, if you have this kind of music in your blood, you can't help but get a charge out of it.

But with this large gathering of musicians in addition to the regular summer people already taxing the area's limited facilities, it is well not to barge up to Tanglewood without making every conceivable preparation from stuffing K rations into your pocket to bringing along a folding cot just in case.

The neighborhood, which is no end stuffy, looks upon the festival as a sort of local secret shared with the hoi polloi with the greatest reluctance and makes no special effort to entertain its visitors. On the contrary, the local population goes to some pains to make you feel as if they expected you might at any moment pull a bunch of toy balloons out of your pocket and hawk them on the street corners. And (is it possible?) shout letters to the editor, that a bare midriff was seen.

Thus, though the festival itself one of the finest musical experiences, the area is one of the most beautiful in Massachusetts and the people connected with the festival are delightful as well as fabulously talented, nothing but confusion can result if you venture up here with the idea of staying a day or two without pretty thoroughly investigating the situation as to rooms, meals, tickets, transportation and raincoats.

You might be lucky and happen on to one of the many really good tourist homes and, of course, if you're driving you can drive until you find something. The way it looks to me, this something might very well turn out to be your own snug bed at home.

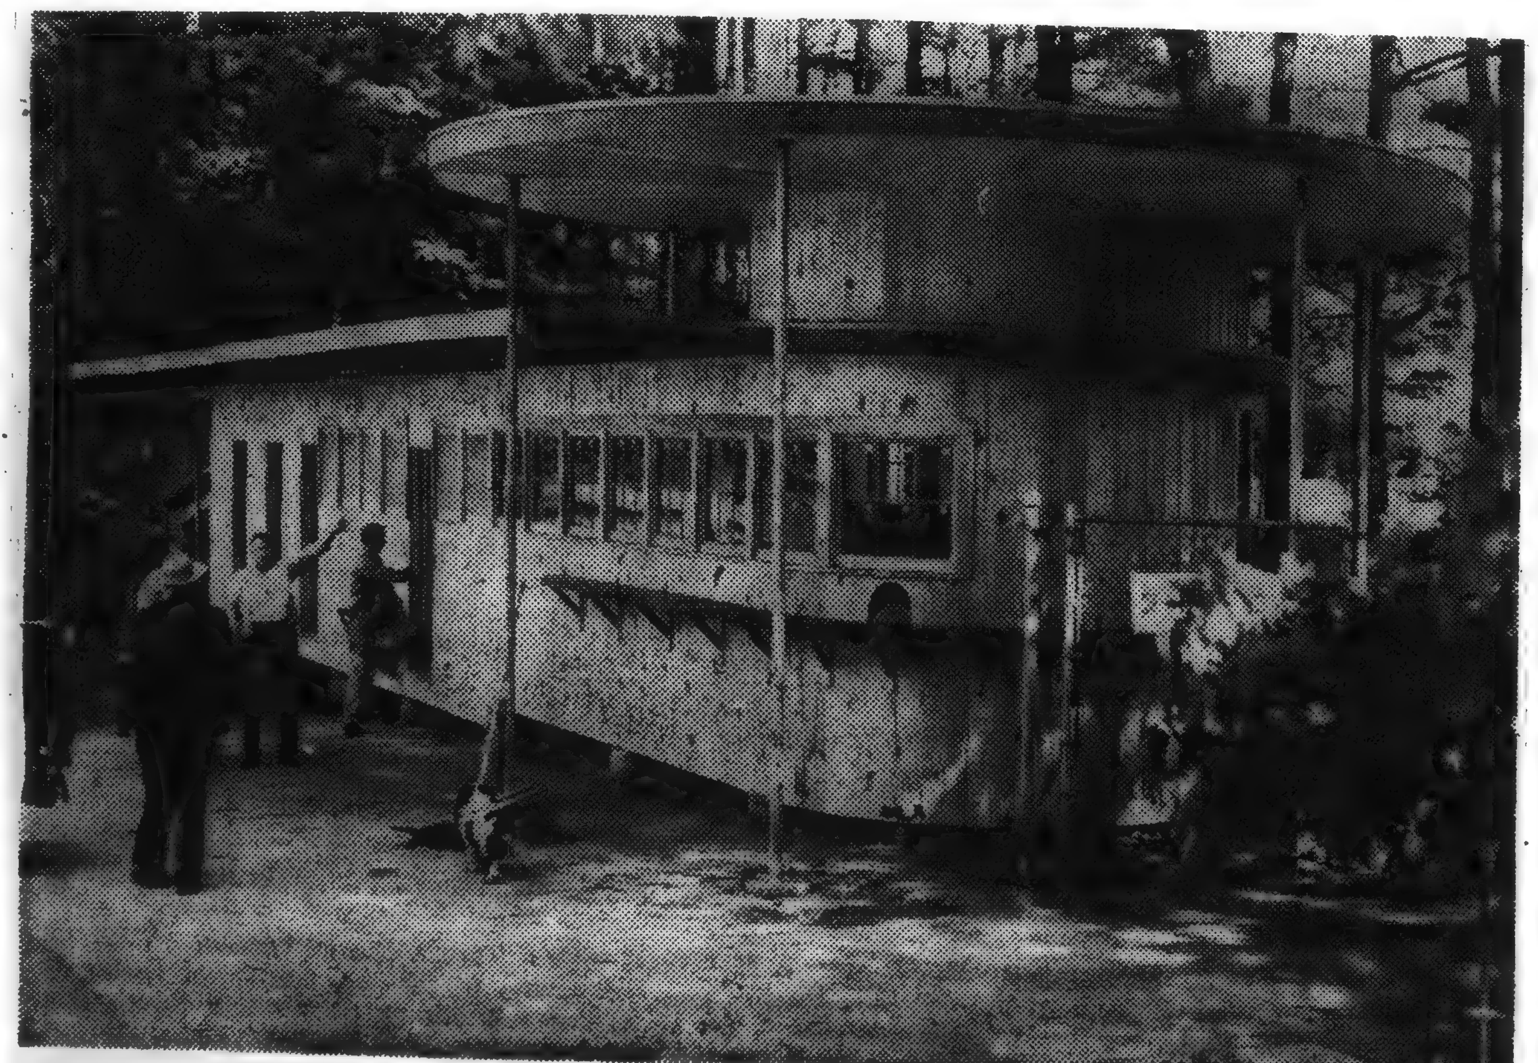
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AUG 8 - 1946

Koussevitzky's Claim Irks Pittsfield Musicia

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's claim that the student orchestra at the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood, Lenox, is as good as the Cleveland and Cincinnati symphony orchestras, is not pleasing to A. J. Pelletier of Pittsfield, a former member of the Cleveland orchestra.

He made public yesterday a scathing letter he had addressed to H. B. Cabot, president of the Boston symphony orchestra trustees, relative to the Koussevitzky remarks which were delivered at the Berkshire Museum's Members' night last Friday. Pelletier said the remark lacked "the tact and taste that a man of his influence should exhibit before the public," was a slap at the members of the two symphony orchestras and an affront to Dr. Artur Dodzinski, Cleveland symphony conductor, who has a summer home in Richmond.



SOMETHING NEW HAS BEEN ADDED: At Tanglewood, this new structure, stained brown with blue trim, will greet students of the Berkshire Music Center and those who attend the Berkshire Festival concerts. It stands at the main gate and will serve as a ticket office, headquarters for the press and an office for the Festival staff, distinct from that of the Music Center which will be housed in the main dwelling. It was constructed from wood obtained on the place by the superintendent, Ward J. Gaston. Ernest J. Cramer of Pittsfield was the contractor and the plans were drawn by Richard Rychtarik of the school faculty.

NEWTOWN, CONN
BEE
8/9/46

Mr and Mrs Roy LaPlant attended on Thursday the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Tanglewood Festival in the Berkshires. George Kousszuitsky conducted the Brahms program.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

AUG 9 - 1946

Dr. Koussevitzky was instrumental in securing the manuscript paper for both Shostakovich and Prokofieff when it was lacking for the Russ composers. Hence he was asked to present their scores.

★ ★ ★

HE INTRODUCED the Prokofieff Symphony No. 5 last November. W[illegible] not how long a ranking compos[illegible] takes for a new work, but Shostakovich, a professor of composition at Moscow Conservatory, took six weeks for the first movement, one week for the second, eight days for the third and five days each for the last two movements.

★ ★ ★

SAN FRA
CA
UG 9 19

G

TH dren
Tang
Bost play
the from licen
G sleep sudd crow fic, cars over as b A so-c diam
the is an sits

TH mising best th
Sim places as I wa absorb played Ehrenb
This Ru to Tangl his tal

WOR

AU

500 Berks

By RAY LENOX, second series night with we night with a concert of the
The Boston chestra, under zky's baton, ha sky, Russian
The program
fieff's "Symph 100," Robert S certo for Violon
tra in A Minor,
ner's prelude to Strauss' "Till E ry Franks."

Exciti

The Prokofie steeped in exci
ing been given ance in Mosco than a year ago,
it has been to
"War and Peac minute designa
ous. Constructiv
The first move
duple and trible
ond movement things, into a c tingling exciten movement is an gio," but tragic final "Allegro G to its prescribe the end when it reference to bru
The work is Prokofieff trade
It has the elusiv
Shostakovich "N
but definable. It times murky ha has that typic
technic of insis rhythm. We hav
by which to judg formance, other the conductor's the composer's w acknowledge an tenance of intere must be found slightly perceptib of rhythm in the
the second move intend to occupy able position out identifying Piatig greatest of living there is certainly claring him to be handful of "gre
The euphonious Sc
certo in A Minor"
ly played. Piatigo vivid. His techn prodigious as the permit, and the k nterpretations is
The broad, swe f Wagner's prelu
rin" brought the appily into the hese brilliantly hrases were in s

[245]

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CALL-BULLETIN

UG 9 1946

George E. Sokolsky

An American Scene— At Tanglewood, Mass.

Copyright, 1946, King Features Syndicate Inc.

TEN THOUSAND MEN, WOMEN and children gather under a big shed, day after day, at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., to listen to the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, play Brahms. Nobody forces anyone to attend the Berkshire Music Festival. But they come from every state in the United States as their license plates show.

Great Barrington, Lee, Lenox, Stockbridge—sleepy New England towns in the Berkshires—suddenly become filled with music-loving crowds. The dirt roads, unused to heavy traffic, take on the problems of Fifth Avenue, cars moving at snail's pace, radiators boiling over, local constables directing the moving lines as best they can—but the crowds come.

And they come not for jazz, nor to view a so-called celebrity, nor to show their furs and diamonds, nor to have their pictures appear in the rotogravure sections of Sunday papers. It is an American audience where the local barber sits with the New York rich who summer here.

THEY COME TO LISTEN to an uncompromising program of musical art, to hear at its best the masters.

Similar festivals have been held in other places in the world, but on Sunday afternoon, as I watched these 10,000 Americans, silent and absorbed, filling their souls with Brahms' First, played gloriously, I could not help recalling Mr. Ehrenburg's comments on American culture. This Russian tourist should have been taken to Tanglewood, where once Hawthorne wrote his tales, close to the house where Longfellow wrote his poetry. There among the haughty pines of unspoiled beauty, he would have caught a glimpse of the depth and seriousness of American cultural maturity. And he might have realized that these people paid their own fares, bought their own tickets, came because they wanted to; no one told them to come.

NONE OF THEM WERE GIVEN TICKETS because they produced goods above quota, or did satisfactory party work, or were rewarded for competent espionage. They are free human beings who can listen, as they choose, to Koussevitzky or Fred Waring, to Brahms or Gershwin.

It is not only so with music but with everything. Who is to tell an American whether he is to read George Bernard Shaw or Erle Stanley Gardner, Shakespeare or Jiggs? Who is to weigh another man's taste or choice by standards other than his own? If President Truman were to say tomorrow that Mark Twain bores him—I am pitting one Missourian against another—the most usual response would be "so what?"

The fact that he is President does not make him a judge of another man's literature. We have no thought control police in this country, no Gestapo, no N.K.V.D., no all-knowing, all-seeing mighty mind that controls and dominates the spirit and will of an entire nation.

It is good to be free. It is a glorious, clean feeling to be able to go anywhere, to listen to anything, to see anything and anybody without police authorization. It is a wonderfully unusual freedom in this degraded age. It is America.

8500 Hear Opening Concert Of Final Week of Festival

New Prokofieff Symphony as Played By Boston Orchestra Reveals Russia's Contemporary Composer at His Best

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The first concert of the final week end of the ninth Berkshire Festival was played at Tanglewood last night before an audience of 8500. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, played the fifth symphony of Prokofieff, the Schumann cello concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" of Wagner and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's merry pranks, after the old-fashioned, roguish manner in rondo form."

'Apple Pie' for Orchestra

The new Prokofieff symphony, (it was first played early last year) shows Russia's leading contemporary composer at his best. It was interesting to hear, comparatively side by side, the sparkling, gay swift-moving sections of this symphony and the devil-may-care pranks of Strauss. Here, on the same program, were two of the master wits of music: Prokofieff, with his incredible facility, retaining always a bit of the debonair, never quite descending to the wise-crack; Strauss not hesitating to use a vulgar equivalent of a Bronx cheer. In any case the music of both is apple pie for the Boston orchestra and their famous conductor. They played with scintillating brilliance last night.

But the Prokofieff symphony has more than the swift second and fourth movements, allegro marcato and allegro giocoso, respectively. The first movement builds up at the end to a majestic climax, and the third movement, adagio, is moving and impressive. There is a self-confidence evident in the whole symphony. We sense that Prokofieff is sure of himself. His music shows a complete lack of self-consciousness. His nonchalance just misses a touch of swagger braggadocio.

"Till" was played with remarkable buoyancy. Indeed, probably one of Koussevitzky's most precious resources is one that Aaron Copland mentioned recently in a speech concerning his superior at the Berkshire Music Center to the effect that he never personally grows blase or bored with any music but his love for it remains new and fresh. We suppose Koussevitzky has been playing this Rondo during all the 50 years since its composition, and yet, last night, he played it with all the ardor and eager anticipation of one to whom it was a late acquaintance. The variety of nuances and the extravagant colors, however gave no suggestion of short familiarity but rather of the true years of cumulative experience he has gained. The orchestra responded with their usual alarity and superlative tone.

In the "Lohengrin" prelude there was opportunity to show a different type of their potentialities. The violins sustained the high-register phrases with gratifying fidelity, and as the other instruments, acquired en route, brought in the lower timbres until the whole gamut was encompassed, the tonal effect was gorgeous and lavish.

Mr. Piatigorsky played the slow movement of his concerto with searching beauty. He used a whisper of tone, yet in the tremendous hush which his artistry commanded, it carried with poignant intensity. Otherwise it was a tame performance of a tame concerto. His tone, when there was opportunity to sustain it, was mellifluent, but the early arpeggios and scales in the first movement were not articulated, nor was there distinction nor spirit to his performance. He was applauded with great enthusiasm and obliged to return several times to acknowledge the approval of the large audience.

Saturday evening the program will include a repetition of the Shostakovitch ninth symphony, the first performance of which in America was on the first program of the festival. This is a highly commendable policy, for it allows more people to hear it, and permits those who will have been present at both concerts to gain a degree of intimacy which, in all fairness, a rational opinion warrants.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG - 9 1946

8500 at Opening of Final Berkshire Concerts

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Aug. 8. — As if to make amends for opening the second series of Berkshire Festival programs last Thursday night with wet dreary weather, 8500 auditors were favored tonight with a cool and unusually pleasant night for the initial concert of the third and final series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's baton, had Gregor Piatigorsky, Russian 'cellist for soloist. The program included Prokofieff's "Symphony No. 5, Opus 100," Robert Schumann's "Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in A Minor, Opus 129"; Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Franks."

Exciting Work

The Prokofieff Symphony is steeped in exciting content. Having been given its first performance in Moscow a little more than a year ago, and compared as it has been to Tolstoy's novel "War and Peace," its up-to-the-minute designation is superfluous. Constructively, it is daring. The first movement coordinates duple and trible beats. The second movement deviates, of all things, into a classic scherzo of tingling excitement. The third movement is an expressive "Adagio," but tragic in mood. The final "Allegro Giocoso" lives up to its prescribed character until the end when it makes ominous reference to brutal warfare.

The work is impregnated with Prokofieff trademarks of style. It has the elusive rhythms of the Shostakovich "Ninth Symphony" but definable. It has harsh, sometimes murky harmonizations. It has that typically Prokofieff technic of insistent, percussive rhythm. We have no precedent by which to judge tonight's performance, other than to point to the conductor's familiarity with the composer's writings, and to acknowledge an unflagging sustenance of interest. If a flaw must be found it would be a slightly perceptible unsteadiness of rhythm in the opening bars of the second movement. We don't intend to occupy an uncomfortable position out on a limb by identifying Piatigorsky as the greatest of living 'cellists, but there is certainly no risk in declaring him to be one of a small handful of "greatest 'cellists." The euphonious Schumann "Concerto in A Minor" was exquisitely played. Piatigorsky's style is vivid. His technic is about as prodigious as the instrument will permit, and the keenness of his interpretations is assured.

The broad, sweeping phrases of Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" brought the bass section happily into the foreground. These brilliantly penetrating phrases were in sharp tonal relief to the opening ethereal mystic chords in the high strings. Koussevitsky scored with the fullest cognizance of its rich, instrumental pattern, lending great emphasis to the gradual evolution of effects through gentle woodwinds, to full brass sonorities, and back to whispering strings. The symbolism of the apparition of the Holy Grail may assume secondary interest to the auditor of Koussevitzky's interpretation but it was a superb illustration of instrumental effectiveness.

It being presstime, we will postpone a discussion of the Strauss tone-poem to a later review. The Saturday evening concert will have Mischa Elman, violinist, for soloist, and the entire festival will be brought to a close Sunday afternoon.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 9 - 1946

8,000 at Tanglewood Hear Boston Symphony

Final Concert Series Opens; Stradivarius Cello Featured

Special to the Herald Tribune

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 8.—Favored by perfect weather, a capacity audience of 6,000 filled the Tanglewood Shed tonight and an additional 2,000 overflowed onto surrounding terrain to hear the first in the final series of Berkshire festival concerts played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

Gregor Piatigorsky was soloist, playing Robert Schumann's "Concerto for Violincello and Orchestra in A Minor." Tonight for the second time the cellist played his newly acquired Stradivarius instrument, which is said to be one of the ten still in perfect condition. He played it for the first time last Sunday afternoon in a performance of Brahms's "Concerto in A Minor for Violin and Violincello," Opus 102, with Erica Morini and the orchestra.

The balance of tonight's program included Prokofieff's "Symphony No. 5," Opus 100; Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin" and Richard Strausse' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," will be repeated tomorrow night, and the two remaining symphony concerts will bc Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

To Koussevitzky

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

The following are some lines I wrote in tribute to Serge Koussevitzky after hearing the week-end concerts at Tanglewood:

Beauty will live forever in these hills, for you have planted music here. Your song is on the ripening corn, upon the flowers and far beyond the vistas of these lawns.

Here is your dream; here the perpetual green; for music has no autumn hour. When snow is on the hemlock hedge and not a leaf remains to tell of summer, the earth will hold your song, still warm; and more, the heart will hold it and feel the sun again—remembering.

ELSIE F. SEARS.

Lenox.

Aug 8

Upholds Koussevitzky

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I am surprised and disappointed to see the important space your paper of Aug. 7 has given Mr. Pelletier's remarks.

Dr. Koussevitzky was addressing friends of music who understand and fully appreciate this unbelievably wonderful accomplishment at Tanglewood. The exceptionally fine music of this young orchestra is the result of the praise and encouragement of their matchless leader. No aspersions were intended.

HARRIET WINNICK.

Pittsfield.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 8 - 1946

TANGLEWOOD SOLOIST

GREGOR PIATIGORSKY

Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, will be the soloist tonight at Tanglewood in Lenox for the Schumann cello concerto with the Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Dr Serge Koussevitzky. The concerto is the one Piatigorsky played here with the Springfield Symphony last season.

The orchestra will also be heard in the Prokofieff Fifth sympony, the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the Wagner Prelude to "Lohengrin." The concert begins at 8.15. Only room on the lawn is available.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

AUG 9 - 1946

Just a reminder to the music-wise—because the genuine article is always preferable to the most faithful facsimile—that the final two concerts in the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are coming up this week-end. When audiences of 10,000 and more flock into a small New England village to hear music, it is at least as significant to the future of civilization as the presence of a comparable number at the Saratoga racetrack.

The program, by the way, has been revised by [illegible] Koussevitzky during the course of the series. The Saturday night proceedings, as now scheduled, will have Mischa Elman as soloist in Martinu's violin concerto. The new Shostakovich Ninth Symphony, played on the opening night of the Festival, is to be repeated Saturday night. The other selections will be Schumann's "American Festival Overture" and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

The concluding concert Sunday afternoon will offer Thompson's "Testament of Freedom"—the recording of which recently was reviewed in this column. And the grand climax of the Festival will be Beethoven's Ninth ("Choral") Symphony.

Aug 9

ection
—Comics

The Berkshire

Pittsfield, Massachusetts.

Five Weeks of Concerts Next Year at Tanglewood

Mischa Elman, violinist, will be the soloist for Martinu's concerto at Festival tomorrow evening.

Five weeks of concerts at Tanglewood in 1947 were announced last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, in the program of the final series for 1946.

According to present plans, the first week will be devoted to Bach, the second to Mozart, the third and fifth week to music ranging from that for early orchestras to the present, and the fourth week of four concerts to Beethoven. Subscribers for this year will have an option on their present seat locations.

This afternoon at 4.30 Olin Downes, New York Times music editor, will lecture on "The Art of Criticism" and tonight will be the third and final presentation by the Berkshire Music Center of Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes." The week-end audience for the Festival concerts will tax the 1100-capacity of the theatre-concert hall.

The three events at Tanglewood tomorrow will be the rehearsal of Beethoven's ninth symphony, at 10 in the morning, open to the public for the benefit of the pension fund; opera scenes at 2.30 in the garden, or in the chamber music hall if it rains; and the eighth Berkshire Festival concert tomorrow evening at 8.15, when Mischa Elman will be soloist for Martinu's violin concerto.

All events except Festival concerts and rehearsal will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

At Tanglewood Today and Tomorrow

Today

*4.30—Lecture on "The Art of Criticism" by Olin Downes.
*8.15—Third performance of opera, "Peter Grimes."

Saturday

10.00—Boston Symphony Ortra public rehearsal, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, for benefit of pension fund.
*2.30—Opera scenes by opera workshop in the garden (in chamber music hall if it rains).
8.15—Berkshire Music Festival Concert, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

*Open to Friends of Berkshire Music Center.

TERRE HAUTE, IND.
TRIBUNE
AUG 9 - 1946

NEW OPERA COMING.

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass.—(UP)—The first American performance of the new opera "Peter Grimes" will be held at th[redacted] Center at Tanglewood Aug 6.

[redacted] Benjamin Briton of London, the opera was chosen to reopen the Sadler Wells Opera after the war. Eric Crozier, who directed the world premier in London, will stage the opera here.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
AUG 8 - 1946

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Stockbridge, Mass, will begin its third and final week of concerts at Tanglewood tonight. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony in a program including Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony. Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, will be the evening's soloist.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
AUG 9 - 1946

MUSIC ENTHRALLS 8000 UNDER FAIR TANGLEWOOD SKY

Boston Symphony Opens Final Series With Prokofieff's Recently Composed Masterpiece

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, Aug. 8—The final series of Berkshire festival concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra opened at [redacted] tonight, Dr Koussevitzky [redacted] composed "Symphony No. 5" as the first part of the program.

This work composed in 1944 and played for the first time in this country by the Boston orchestra last November was heard for the first time in this setting. It proved to be a forthright vigorous work, impressive from the very opening of the "Andante" with its two full voiced melodic themes in contrasting rhythms, with the characteristic hand of the composer more in evidence in his ingenious treatment of the woodwinds over a tricky rhythm in the delightful "Scherzo." The "Adagio" in a deeply tragic mood, opens with a haunting melody by the woodwinds which is in turn carried by the strings to their very highest register, above a persistent accompaniment figure. In spite of the work ending with an "Allegro giocoso" there is a brooding quality about it. "Something ominous seems always to lurk about the corner." Dr Koussevitzky who approaches this music with such sympathy and fundamental understanding gave the work a highly vital and at times thrilling performance.

Rousing Ovation

After the intermission Gregor Piatigorsky, whose broad style of playing was neccessarily held within bounds in the Brahms double concerto last week, had more free play in a superb performance of Robert Schumann's concerto for violoncello and orchestra. In three movements played without pause, and remarkable for its happy balance and interweaving of the solo instrument with the orchestra, the work abounds in humor and vivacity. The soloist's tone was of melting beauty in the slow movement, one of the composer's most beautiful pages. In the cadenza of the "Finale" Mr Piatigorsky gave an exhibition of virtuosity the like of which only he himself is capable. Naturally he received a rousing ovation.

The program closed with the Prelude to "Lohengrin", and the "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss. The latter, Strauss's greatest tone poem is a piece long identified with this orchestra, its recording being one of their most popular discs. It was a virtuoso performance on the part of all concerned. Dr Koussevitzky was recalled repeatedly, each time inviting the men of the orchestra to arise and share in the well deserved applause.

Phila. Inquirer

RIDAY MORNING. AUGUST 9. 1946

GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Culture Our Russian Critic Missed Revealed by Berkshire Gathering

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 8.—Ten thousand men, women and children gather under a big shed, day after day, at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., to listen to the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, play Brahms.

Nobody forces anyone to attend the Berkshire Music Festival. But they come from every State in the United States as their license plates show.

NOT FOR JAZZ

They come great distances to hear the masters in this mountain setting, under stars.

Great Barrington, Lee, Lenox, Stockbridge, sleepy New England towns in the Berkshires, suddenly become filled with music-loving crowds. The dirt roads, unused to heavy traffic, take on the problems of Fifth Avenue, cars moving at snail's pace, radiators boiling over, local constables directing the moving lines as best they can—but the crowds come.

Each year more and more come, so many more that the great shed can no longer hold them and many bring blankets to sit out on the grass.

FILLING THEIR SOULS

And they come not for jazz, nor to view a so-called celebrity, nor to show their furs and diamonds, nor to have their pictures appear in the Rotogravure Sections of Sunday papers.

It is an American audience where the local barber sits with the New York rich who summer here. They come to listen to an uncompromising program of musical art, to hear at its best the masters—one year Brahms and Beethoven—another year Mozart—and always the works of aspiring American musicians, who here may have a first opportunity to be heard.

Four hundred musical students attend the Tanglewood School during the summer. Thousands of aspirants for musical achievement watch Koussevitzky rehearse the most perfect orchestra in the world.

HOT LICKS OR BRAHMS

Similar festivals have been held in other places in the world, but on Sunday afternoon, as I watched these 10,000 Americans, silent and absorbed, filling their souls with Brahms' First, played gloriously, I could not help recalling Mr. Ehrenburg's comments on American culture.

This Russian tourist should have been taken to Tanglewood, where once Hawthorne wrote his tales, close to the house where Longfellow wrote his poetry. There among the haughty pines of unspoiled beauty, he would have caught a glimpse of the depth and seriousness of American cultural maturity. And he might have realized that these people paid their own fares, bought their own tickets, came because they wanted to; no one told them to come.

None of them were given tickets because they produced goods above quota, or did satisfactory party work, or were rewarded for competent espionage. They are free human beings who can listen, as they choose, to Koussevitzky or Fred Waring, to Brahms or Gershwin or Kerns or some Hot-Licks Swing Composer. They have free choice and they exercise it at will.

NO BOOK-BURNING

And there is no government to interfere.

It is not only so with music but with everything. Who is to tell an American whether he is to read George Bernard Shaw or Erle Stanley Gardner, Shakespeare or Jiggs?

Who is to weigh another man's taste or choice by standards other than his own? If President Truman were to say tomorrow that Mark Twain bores him—I am putting one Missourian against another—the most usual response would be, "So what?"

The fact that he is President does not make him a judge of another man's literature. We have no Thought Control Police in this country, no Gestapo, no N.K.V.D., no all-knowing, all-seeing mighty mind that controls and dominates the spirit and will of an entire nation. Nor do we exclude writers, or burn books, or denounce music because someone says that someone is a Fascist.

DEGRADED AGE

In fact, in this capitalist country, the Communist Howard Fast's book is advertised in all newspapers, and in America, which is essentially Christian, an atheist receives an order from the FCC establishing atheism as a proper subject for radio discussion in competition with God.

It is good to be free. It is a glorious, clean feeling to be able to go anywhere, to listen to anything, to see anything and anybody without police authorization. It is a wonderfully unusual freedom in this degraded age.

It is America.

Koussevitzky Surprised At Pelletier's Comments

Refers to Letter Addressed to Orchestra Trustees' Head as 'Biased' Interpretation of Museum Remarks

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, declared today that he was "surprised to find such biased interpretation and malevolence" regarding his brief talk at the Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield, Aug. 2.

The conductor was referring to a letter written to Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, by A. J. Pelletier of 137 Elm Street and published in The Eagle Wednesday. Mr. Pelletier in his letter asked for enlightenment of a remark made by Dr. Koussevitzky when he said the student orchestra at Tanglewood is as good as the Cleveland and Cincinnati orchestras. The conductor's statement follows:

I am surprised to find such biased interpretation and malevolence from a member of this community toward which I feel a close association. There can be no place for narrow viewpoint and smallness of conception where youth and the building of the musical future of America is concerned.

Indeed, I happened to mention the Cleveland and Cincinnati Orchestras as examples of the high artistic standards of two of our major symphony orchestras—a criterion for which we strive with our hand-picked students. Should I then take orchestras of lower standards as examples for our youth? Will they not in the nearest future become members and complete the ranks of most of our leading musical organizations?

I have no doubt that the correct meaning of my words, my boundless enthusiasm and encouragement to these wonderful young American musicians, would not escape the genuine understanding of the leaders of these two orchestras—men of high cultural background and outstanding artistic achievement. For they, too, would not fail to encourage the musical youth of this country in creating the cultural future in which these young people will play so vital a part.

[247]

Friday, August 9, 1946

AUFBAU

Berkshire Festival

Musik, Natur und Menschentum — Bericht eines musikalisch Ungebildeten

Am See Mah-Kee-Nac in den Berkshires, jenseits aller Bilbo- und Talmadge-Grenzen, liegt Tanglewood. Hier erscheint einmal im Jahr, vier Druckseiten stark die "Tanglewood Times". Auf ihrer ersten Seite über dem Titel steht das Motto: "Gerechtigkeit und Freiheit für jedermann". Und die fünfspaltige Schlagzeile heisst — sinngemäss übersetzt — "Koussevitzky fordert die staatliche Unterstützung der schönen Künste."

Koussevitzky fordert aber erst, nachdem er selbst etwas Grosses geleistet hat, nämlich die Schaffung seines Berkshire Music Center.

Heute steht da, wo Koussevitzky und sein Boston Symphony Orchester in einem Zirkuszelt begannen, die grosse Festspielhalle. Eine Festspielhalle, nicht aus goldenem Stuck und mit Samt ausgeschlagen, sondern eine nach drei Seiten einladend offene Eisenkonstruktion, zum Teil mit Holz verkleidet und nur da, um die Akustik zu unterstützen. Kein verschnörkeltes Festspielgefäss, sondern nur Inhalt. Dieser Zweckbau ohne Türen und Tore ist der Mittelpunkt einer Festspielwiese, auf der Tausende liegen, die keinen Stuhl brauchen, sondern mit Decken und Sonnenschirmen, wie zu einem Picknick kommen, bei dem Musik das Hauptgericht ist. (Dass auch kalte Milch und heisse Würstchen daneben serviert wurden, versteht sich von selbst).

Hier müsste jetzt eine sachgemässe Kritik folgen. Aber ob Tempi richtig gehalten werden, oder ob die Holzbläser pünktlich jedes Leitmotiv übernehmen, bedeutet nichts gegen das grosse Ereignis, das das Atombombenzeitalter Lügen straft. Und dieses Ereignis ist nicht die Tatsache eines Konzertes, sondern dass der Begriff "L'art pour l'art" noch gelten kann.

Für Pilger zu den Berkshire Festivals der kommenden Jahre: Das Programm für 1946 des ersten Zyklus beginnt mit: Shostakovitch und ging über Beethoven, Rachmaninoff, Ravel, Mendelssohn und Copland zu Schumann. Im zweiten Zyklus (3 Konzerte) wurde nur Brahms gespielt. In der letzten Woche besteht das Programm aus: Prokofieff, Schumann, Wagner, Strauss, Martinu, Shostakovitch, Tchaikovsky, Thompson und klingt aus mit der Neunten Symphnie von Beethoven. Solisten sind (in der Reihenfolge des Programms): Eugene List, Claudio Arrau, Carol Brice, Erica Morini, Gregor Piatigorsky und Mischa Elman.

Die Festspiele sind zwar der Höhepunkt, aber die gesamte Berkshire-Landschaft zwischen Lenox and Stockbridge ist ein musikalischer Schauplatz, der belebt ist von den Musikern des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, von den Studenten und den Mitgliedern der Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Findet man in dieser Gegend weggeflogene Papiere am Wegrand, so sind es Noten. Man kann Werke von Cherubini, Palestrina, Mozart und Gumpelzhaimer auflesen. Auf den Strassen begegnen sich die Menschen und Sprachen aller Erdteile und Autos mit den Schildern aus allen 48 Staaten der Union nehmen wie selbstverständlich die Fussgänger zu den Konzerten mit.

Kunst zieht Kunst an. So gibt es in Pittsfield das Berkshire Museum mit immer wechselnden Ausstellungen, die Rollins Theater School in Lenox hat in ihrem Programm eine neue amerikanische Fassung von "Hanneles Himmelfahrt". Dr. John Reich von den Salzburger Festspielen führt hier Regie und Hans Sondheimer, vor sechs Jahren Expediteur des "Aufbau", ist der technische Ratgeber. Jacob's Pillow University of the Dance steht im benachbarten Städtchen Lee.

Aber der Mittelpunkt aller Dinge ist Serge Koussevitzky und seine Leistung. Diese Leistung hat er nicht mit der Organisation des Berkshire Music Center abgeschlossen. In grosser immerwährender Arbeit will er unermüdlich aus Musik noch mehr machen als eine Kunstgattung. In seiner Eröffnungsrede für diese Saison, sagte er ungefähr:

"Musik hat die Kraft und Mögphische, soziale, politische, geographische, rassische und religiöse Grenzen zu überspringen. Musik allein spricht die eine Sprache, die von allen verstanden wird und verstanden werden will. Musik allein kann das Tier im Menschen zähmen, Musik ist unser Trost und unsere Hoffnung."

Ludwig Wronkow

DALTON, MASS
PRESS
8/9/46

TANGLEWOOD FEATURES "PETER GRIMES"

The six weeks session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude at Tanglewood, Lenox this week end with eight musical events. Most important will be the final two concerts of the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, tomorrow night at 8:15 and Sunday afternoon at 3:30, the third performance tonight of the opera, "Peter Grimes," which had its initial presentation in the western hemisphere Tuesday before an audience that included 50 music critics from New York, Boston and other distant newspapers.

Saturday's festival program will include Schuman's American Festival Overture; Martinu's Concerto for Violin with Mischa Elman as soloist; Tchaikovsky's "Francesca Da Rimini" and the second festival performance of Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony, which will be broadcast for the first time in America. The series opened last evening with an audience that exceeded the capacity of the shed by 2000.

To conclude the festival on Sunday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom," for Men's voices with orchestra, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with soloists and chorus from the Music Center. The orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky will hold a public rehearsal tomorrow morning at 10 for the benefit of the pension fund.

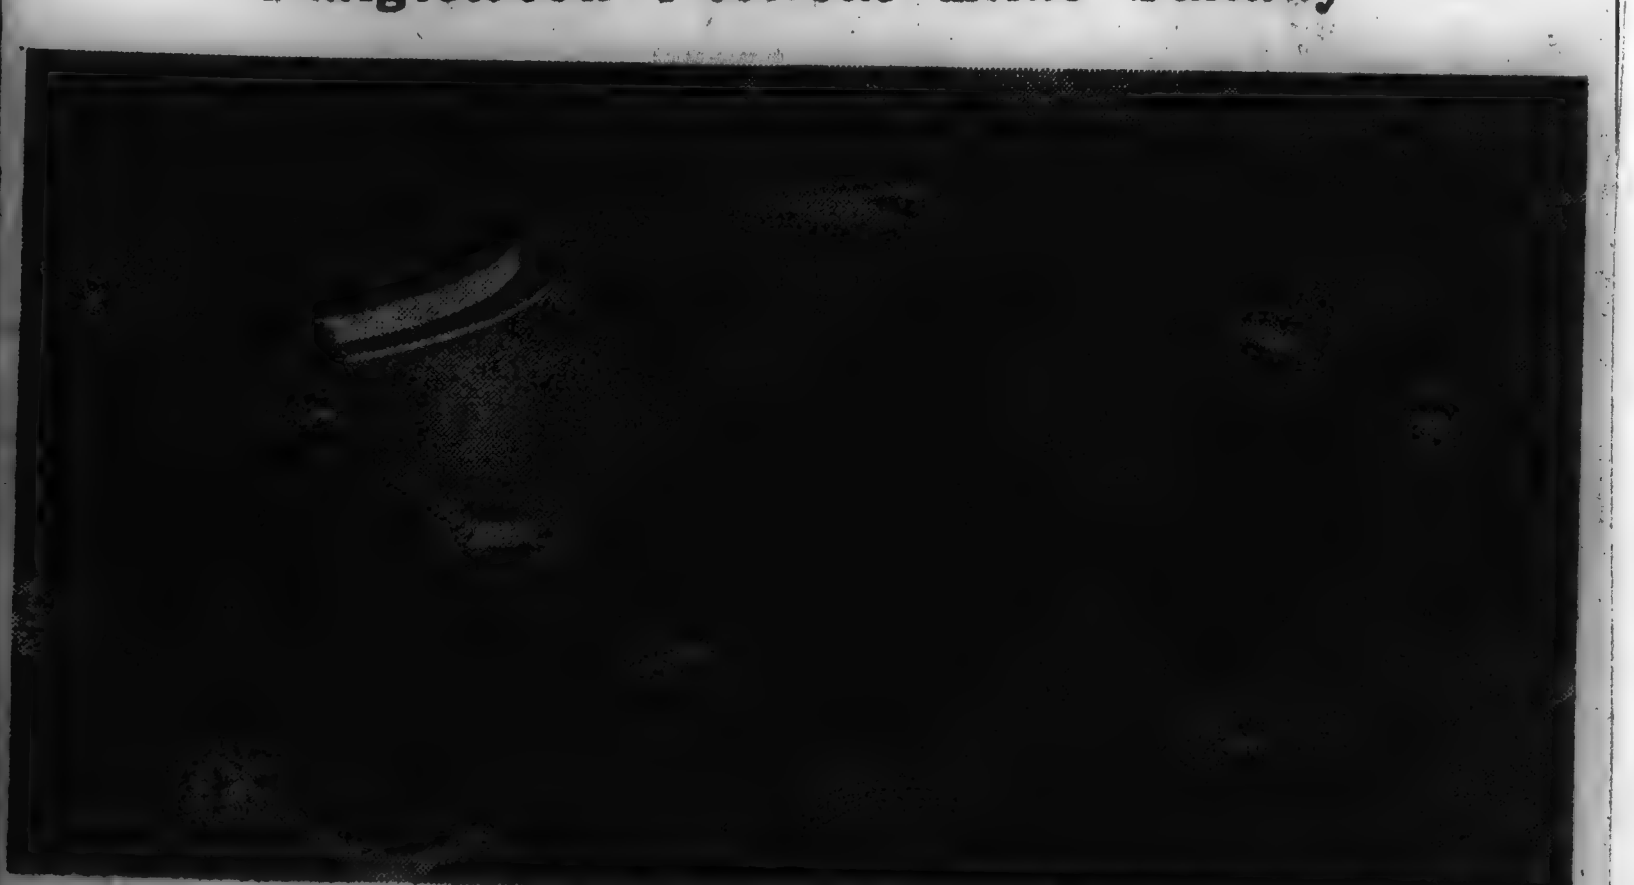
Events at the school, open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will include a spmphony concert by department 2 orchestra today at 2:15, followed by the last of four lectures by Olin Downes, New York Times music editor, on "The Art of Criticism;" opera scenes in the formal gardens tomorrow at 2:30 (if wet, in the chamber music hall); and a concert by department 2 chamber music group Sunday mornat 10:30.

On the days of the concerts admission may be bought to the grounds, from which 11,000 heard the concerts last week end.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 9 - 1946

Tanglewood Festival Ends Sunday



Lenox, Aug. 9—With a performance of the Beethoven Ninth symphony the Berkshire Music festival will end its ninth season Sunday afternoon. Dr Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston orchestra in the Randall Thompson "Testament of Freedom." Robert Shaw has prepared the chorus and the soloists will be Joseph Laderoute, tenor; James Pease, bass; Frances Yeend, soprano; and Eunice Alberts, contralto. Fair weather and huge crowds have generally attended this year's series.

NEWS

AUG 9 - 1946

Berkshire Music Festival Offers Prokofieff's Fifth

War Born Symphony Gets Glittering Treatment as Series Enters Final Week at Tanglewood

By JOHN D. DONOGHUE

Lenox, Aug. 9—The third and last week of the Berkshire Music festival opened last ~~night at Tanglewood with~~ a program by the Boston symphony which proved more interesting in performance than it had appeared on paper.

It opened with the Prokofieff Fifth symphony, and, after intermission, continued with the Schumann cello concerto, Gregor Piatigorsky, soloist, and the Prelude to "Lohengrin," and ended with the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel." In advance, it was difficult to find any unifying theme for such a program, but the variety gave to the orchestra opportunity to display its virtuosity, and to the audience of 8000 a chance to savor that virtuosity.

First sample was the Prokofieff, which was composed within a month in the summer of 1944. While it has some puckish instrumentation, it is essentially tragic, and might well bespeak the travails that troubled Russia at that time. Even though the last movement is marked "allegro giocoso" it is rather a grim joke that the composer seems to have in mind. Although the composer has said the symphony has no program, he later admitted "it is a symphony about the spirit of man." The themes are provocative and usually hard to follow amid the orchestration which runs the gamut of percussive tricks. The piano, for example, is cleverly used for some stunning rhythmic accents and some unusual color effects in the treble. The symphony was given a glittering presentation, though it is hard to believe that the work will become standard fare among orchestras that have not Ser~~ge Koussevitzky's~~ interest in promoting ~~Russian music~~.

The Schumann concerto, an undertaking in which the orchestra and the soloist have collaborated before, found both in fine form. The incredible technic of the soloist, the fine balance and the melodic charm of the work were facets of the performance that were especially memorable. There were a few spots where there seemed a difference of opinion on tempos, but all's well that ends well, and the work ended in a blaze of glory and applause.

Little need be said about the Wagner which is one of the orchestra's showpieces for its shimmering strings. As for the Strauss, best testimony of its success was the ripple of chuckling that ran through the shed as the prankster came to his unrepentant end. The orchestra's recording is the definitive one and the performance ranked with it.

Tomorrow morning at 10, the orchestra stages a public rehearsal with admission fees going to the orchestra's pension fund.

Tomorrow night, the Shostakovich Ninth symphony will be repeated. Mischa Elman will be soloist in the Martinu violin concerto and the program will also include the Schuman "American Festival Overture" and the Tschaikowsky "Solemn Overture." Sunday afternoon, the Randall Thompson "Festival of Freedom" and the Beethoven Ninth symphony will conclude this happy, successful ninth season.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

AUG 9 - 1946

Music

Prokofieff Symphony Revalued

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9.—A commemorative bronze tablet was unveiled at the Music Shed in Tanglewood, just prior to last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Placed at the left of the shed, the tablet's inscription reads: "In gratitude to the trustees and friends of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival for their promotion of Music in the Berkshires under the leadership of Gertrude Robinson Smith, and for the gift of this shed this tablet has been placed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tanglewood, 1946."

Last night's concert was a four-part affair, offering again in the spot of soloist the noted 'cellist Gregor Piatigorsky. This time he played that beacon among 'cello concertos, the Schumann in A minor, Op. 129. This composer shared the evening with three others, Prokofieff, via the Fifth Symphony, Op. 100; Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin," and Richard Strauss, the prankish tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Prokofieff's Fifth, you may or may not remember, was given its first performance at Moscow, in January, 1945. And the Boston Symphony introduced it to this country in November of the same year.

Prokofieff Fifth.

It is rather odd that Prokofieff, having written four symphonies in 12 years, did not write another until 15 years later, or thereabouts. Odd, because the symphonic form has always been right up his alley. The reason advanced for his lean symphony years is the same that Mahler once gave, "to write a symphony means to me to create a whole world." These sound like the words of a lazy man, but heaven knows that neither Mahler nor Prokofieff can so be described.

I like this symphony. I like its toyland fantasy, the sparkle and sputter, the fleet little phrases that dart and leap about so playfully in the first movement. Later on Prokofieff gets serious, not quite as serious as some of his predecessors of the romantic 19th Century, perhaps, but reflective and searching nevertheless, and a good deal in their own vein. And the joyous spirit of play returns for some measures in the finale. All in all, it is thoroughly representative of the Russian composer at his best, and that means first-rate workmanship and distinguished taste.

Schumann Concerto.

Mr. Piatigorsky, who left right after last night's performance, in order to be in New York for his first recording takes in the Federal Films' production "[illegible] Hall," which also features the Philharmonic-Symphony, [illegible] the Schumann like the true poet he can be.

The softly tender expression of this work, its introspective, slow mediation, the restrained flow of melody and the ever fresh and singing spirit proved entirely in the soloist's domain. Schumann was performed as he should be performed, with a light grace and purity and well-cut patterns. And the orchestra's part in the proceedings was beautifully delivered by the Bostonians, who made a proper frame for the diffident complaining tones of the solo instrument.

Naturally, Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians turned all of their jewel mechanism perfection on Strauss' redoubtable "Till"; the roguish manner was the instinct in the performance of this enduringly stimulating composition, and literary program or no literary program, it was not too difficult to trace the madcap hero all through the zany pointed antics.

[248]

8500 Hear Opening Concert Of Final Week of Festival

New Prokofieff Symphony as Played By Boston Orchestra Reveals Russia's Contemporary Composer at His Best

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The first concert of the final week end of the ninth Berkshire Festival was played at Tanglewood last night before an audience of 8500. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, played the fifth symphony of Prokofieff, the Schumann cello concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" of Wagner and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's merry pranks, after the old-fashioned, roguish manner in rondo form."

'Apple Pie' for Orchestra

The new Prokofieff symphony, (it was first played early last year) shows Russia's leading contemporary composer at his best. It was interesting to hear, comparatively side by side, the sparkling, gay swift-moving sections of this symphony and the devil-may-care pranks of Strauss. Here, on the same program, were two of the master wits of music: Prokofieff, with his incredible facility, retaining always a bit of the debonair, never quite descending to the wise-crack; Strauss not hesitating to use a vulgar equivalent of a Bronx cheer. In any case the music of both is apple pie for the Boston orchestra and their famous conductor. They played with scintillating brilliance last night.

But the Prokofieff symphony has more than the swift second and fourth movements, allegro marcato and allegro giocoso, respectively. The first movement builds up at the end to a majestic climax, and the third movement, adagio, is moving and impressive. There is a self-confidence evident in the whole symphony. We sense that Prokofieff is sure of himself. His music shows a complete lack of self-consciousness. His nonchalance just misses a touch of swagger braggadocio.

"Till" was played with remarkable buoyancy. Indeed, probably one of Koussevitzky's most precious resources is one that Aaron Copland mentioned recently in a speech concerning his superior at the Berkshire Music Center to the effect that he never personally grows blase or bored with any music but his love for it remains new and fresh. We suppose Koussevitzky has been playing this Rondo during all the 50 years since its composition, and yet, last night, he played it with all the ardor and eager anticipation of one to whom it was a late acquaintance. The variety of nuances and the extravagant colors, however gave no suggestion of short familiarity but rather of the true years of cumulative experience he has gained. The orchestra responded with their usual alarity and superlative tone.

In the "Lohengrin" prelude there was opportunity to show a different type of their potentialities. The violins sustained the high-register phrases with gratifying fidelity, and as the other instruments, acquired en route, brought in the lower timbres until the whole gamut was encompassed, the tonal effect was gorgeous and lavish.

Mr. Piatigorsky played the slow movement of his concerto with searching beauty. He used a whisper of tone, yet in the tremendous hush which his artistry commanded, it carried with poignant intensity. Otherwise it was a tame performance of a tame concerto. His tone, when there was opportunity to sustain it, was mellifluent, but the early arpeggios and scales in the first movement were not articulated, nor was there distinction nor spirit to his performance. He was applauded with great enthusiasm and obliged to return several times to acknowledge the approval of the large audience.

Saturday evening the program will include a repetition of the Shostakovitch ninth symphony, the first performance of which in America was on the first program of the festival. This is a highly commendable policy, for it allows more people to hear it, and permits those who will have been present at both concerts to gain a degree of intimacy which, in all fairness, a rational opinion warrants.

POST

AUG 9 - 1946

Words and Music

Piatigorsky Is Soloist In Tanglewood Concert

By John Briggs

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 9—Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony last night opened the ~~final~~ series of Berkshire Festival concerts, with Gregor Piatigorsky as cello soloist.

Mr. Piatigorsky played the Schumann A Minor cello concerto. The orchestral portion of the program included a new Prokofieff Symphony, the Fifth, and two concert standbys, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the prelude to "Lohengrin."

Mr. Piatigorsky's part in the performance reflected, no doubt, the hazards of outdoor music performance. Damp night air and mountain breezes can do strange things to stringed instruments. In fact, not to waste time in getting to the point, I thought that for an artist of his eminence Mr. Piatigorsky played very badly.

Lacks Precision

In the rapid closing section of the concerto, the celebrated virtuoso's playing was often untidy. Phrases were not clean cut, and he was frequently out of tune. Many of the florid passages were simply slurred over. The clarity and precision of an exciting performance were notably absent.

Mr. Piatigorsky was at his most expressive in the "Langsam" portion of the concerto, where his rich, vibrant tone and his interpretative skill made the most of Schumann's lush melodic line.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra supplied a background for Mr. Piatigorsky which was all that could be asked in the way of ensemble and dynamic balance.

Gloomy Prokofieff

The new Prokofieff Symphony (first played last winter by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians) was written after the composer had been absent from the Symphonic field for fifteen years. It is in violent contrast to the D Major and other early symphonies. It demonstrates the same deftness in orchestration, the same skilled craftsmanship; but its content is more explosive. It is a gloomy, troubled work. Beside the sunny "classical" Symphony it is violent as an equinoctial storm.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the Prokofieff with tremendous enthusiasm, and made the most of the lyric beauty of the "Lohengrin" music. "Till Eulenspiegel" was appropriately roguish. A large audience, which packed every corner of the music shed and overflowed onto the lawn, greeted the night's doings with every sign of satisfaction.

'THE RAPE OF LUCRETIA'

By ERNEST NEWMAN

THERE can be no actual comparison, of course, between two operas so different both in subject and in form as "Peter Grimes" and "The Rape of Lucretia"; but for all that I must register my impression that Mr. Britten's second opera does not fulfil all the expectations set up in us by his first, and most of the blame for this I would lay on the libretto. The dramatic technique of dispensing with virtually all the usual stage action by leaving it to a "Chorus" (in the antique sense of the word) to describe for us the course of events, a Chorus which, standing as it does outside space and time, has the privilege of commenting philosophically on not only the before but the after of the events, was put to great use in André Obey's drama "Le Viol de Lucrèce" (1931). Mr. Ronald Duncan's procedure runs parallel to a great extent with that of his omhey ally t is and the own are omof

The see of ers,

he feels himself under the constant necessity of being "literary." Many of his carefully carpentered images creak as we read them; they creak still more when they are sung, for the heightening of our sensibilities by music makes us much more critical of a dubious line in song or opera than we are when it is only read or spoken.

I must confess my astonishment that Mr. Britten, with his generally superfine sensitiveness in these matters, did not foresee the effect that some of Mr. Duncan's lines would have on us when we heard them sung. We feel, even when we read them, that such flowers of speech as "So will my little vase contain The sun's exuberance slaked with rain," or "So will my pretty vase enclose The sun's extravagance which is the rose" are not really poetry but only shop samples of "poetic diction"; but when they are sung by a couple of servant girls as they arrange Lucretia's flowers we cannot repress a smile. And the smile is apt to become a titter, as it did all round me at Glyndebourne the other evening, when the selfsame damsels, forgetting their laboriously acquired literary manners, drop into such colloquialisms as "Oh! What a lovely morning! . . . It's going to be hot, unbearably hot, And I daresay it will thunder." If the Biancas and Lucias of early Rome talked as Mr. Duncan's do, how did the Mary Annes and the Mary Ellens talk?

This scene, indeed, should be recast. It is not merely that it reminds us, to its disadvantage, of the famous scene between Madam Butterfly and Suzuki; it was handled with such naïveté of technique at Glyndebourne that everyone was amused, and there should be no provocation to amusement in a tragedy like this.

If we want to see how far Mr. Duncan can sometimes fall behind his French confrère we have only to compare the different manners of the two when the Male and Female Chorus make an excursion into history. This is how M. Obey makes them read from their Book of Fate:

> Le Récitant: Lisez! Lisez! Page cinquante - deux: "Cultrum, quem sub veste abditum habebat . . ."
>
> La Récitante: Je ne comprends pas.
>
> Le Récitant: " . . . eum in corde defigit . . ."
>
> La Récitante: Je ne comprends pas. Je ne comprends pas.
>
> Le Récitant: (comme en s'excusant): Tite-Live . . Histoire Romaine.
>
> La Récitante: Non, non, non. Cela ne s'est pas passé ainsi, avec cette pompeuse froideur. Ecoutez! . . . (Doucement). Ecoutez! . . . (Avec tendresse). "Poor bird . . ."
>
> Le Récitant: Je ne saisis pas.
>
> La Récitante: Pauvre oiseau . . . "Poor frighted deer . . ."
>
> Le Récitant: Je ne vois pas . . .
>
> La Récitante: "Pauvre biche effrayée, qui s'arrête soudain au carrefour d'une forêt en cherchant quelle route l'éloignera des chiens, ainsi Lucrèce en proie aux meutes du doute . . ." Elle hésita, vous voyez bien, elle hésita. Elle . . . elle hésite.

M. Obey, it will be seen, not only manages to quote Livy and Shakespeare without setting up any sense of incongruity in us but relates it all poignantly to the drama. What Mr. Duncan gives us when, in the prologue to his second act, the Female Chorus reads from her Book, is a University Extension lecture:

> The prosperity of the Etruscans was due to the richness of their native soil, the virility of their men, and the fertility of their women . . . , See Virgil, Book II, verse five three four: "Sic fortis Etruria crevit" etcetera . . All authorities agree that the Etruscan conquest of Rome dates from 600 B.C.—that is, approximately;

and so on for nearly thirty lines packed with useful information: how many people at Glyndebourne, or even among the intelligentsia of Sadler's Wells, will have known before that "Their [the Etruscans'] passion for music was notorious (as witness [witnessed?] by the fragment of Alcimus and other references, including Eratosthenes)"? Without a knowledge of these vital facts, of course, no one's education can be considered complete; but is the opera house the best place in which to teach us them? Once more I ask myself what had become of Mr. Britten's sense of the theatre and his feeling for his tragic subject when he allowed things of this sort to go into the libretto.

I shall return next week to one or two other features of the text and have a word or two to say about the music.

THE CONTEMPORARY MUSIC FESTIVAL

The final concert last Sunday of the Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music brought us the now familiar Concerto of Bela Bartok, the racy, imaginative and thoroughly competent "Cortèges" of Alan Rawsthorne, and, on a lower slope, a violin concerto by Roman Palester (Poland) that was interesting without being exciting, and a Nocturne for Orchestra by Raymond Loucheur (France) to which it was difficult to attach the epithet "contemporary," for it smacked in almost every bar of early post-Tristanism.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 9 - 1946

CONCERTO GIVEN AT TANGLEWOOD

Piatigorsky Is Superb in the Schumann Work

By Willard M. Clark

LENOX, Aug. 8—Prokofieff's fifth symphony high-lighted the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood ~~[illegible]~~ first concert of the final series, made memorable not only by the performance of the Prokofieff opus, but by the magnificient performance of Schumann's "Concerto for Cello and Orchestra in A Minor" by Gregor Piatigorsky. Other numbers on the program include the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the ever-delightful "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by Strauss.

"Provoking Melodies"

The performance of Prokieff's symphony was, to say the least, exciting. With characteristic prodigality, the Russian has loaded this work with provoking melodies which are tossed back and forth among the choirs in fascinating manner. These melodies, with a bewildering array of ever-changing rhythms, combine to hold the listener enthralled. While there is plenty of Prokofieff humor, there is also a savage, somber underlying current that finds its outlet through tremendous wind passages, through a steady reiteration of accompaniment, incisive and intent. One of the loveliest, most effective moments of the symphony is heard during the lyrical episode which closes the third movement. The finale opens in a mood of quasigaiety, pure lyricism, shattered from time to time by brutal dissonances, making one aware of the warfare which lingers throughout the work. It was a superb performance, with Koussevitzky and his men revelling in ~~[illegible]~~ its rhythms and its beauty.

From the moment Gregor Piatigorsky strode upon the stage, swinging his cello as though it were a viola, he held the center of the stage. The Schumann concerto, which wanders melodiously throughout its length, offers opportunity for virtuoso display, but that is subservient to the broad lyric passages in which the cellist drew tones of ravishing beauty from his fabulous instrument. Tonight there was a perfect union of soloist and orchestra, a perfect unanimity of thought between soloist and conductor. No wonder that at the close a veritable ovation was given all concerned.

Leaves for Recording

We are told that immediately after the performance, Piatigorsky left for New York to start recordings for his role in the film production "Carnegie Hall." He will play the famous cello solo, "The Swan," by Saint-Saens, and his instrument will be projected against a musical background of 10 harps.

Koussevitzky's reading of the prelude from "Lohengrin" is too well known to need extended comment. How wonderfully the strings sing! Surely there are none finer than the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert closed with a delightful performance of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." It is hard to believe that this work had its first performance some 51 years ago. Its melodies are so fresh, so smart, its rhythms so exciting that it might have been written yesterday. There is no need to know the story. From the introduction to the portentous descending interval of the rogue's condemnation, every action is mirrored in the music. The performance was superb, rich in comedy and contrasts, a performance to be a cherished memory.

The program Saturday night will include a repeat performance of the ninth symphony of Shostakovitch; William Schuman's "American Festival Overture"; the "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra" by Martino, played by Mischa Elman, and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 9 - 1946

THE MUSIC BOX

By JOHN D. DONOGHUE

With such a music treasure house as Tanglewood so near it is easy to overlook the musical doings elsewhere in the world, but even in this mid-August heat, there are stirrings that hint of a busy fall musical season everywhere. The Berkshire Music festival will end Sunday, and for Western Massachusetts concert goers that will mark the real end of the season.

It is not too many years ago since seasons were expected to end in late April or early May, and while there were a few hardy organizations that programmed summer music, it was largely fare drawn from the Strauss family, the Herberts, the Sousas and the Rombergs.

Programs as uncompromising as the all-Brahms week which the Berkshire festival offered this past week at Tanglewood were generally unheard of. But Dr Koussevitzky has helped make this section of the state, and even of the country, as stern in its standards as Boston itself. The Bostonians have worked painstakingly to make music a year around diet, and certainly the audiences that have overflowed the Tanglewood shed on every occasion bespeak a wonderful success.

There's a great expectancy in looking forward to the Beethoven Ninth symphony which ends the festival Sunday, but we must confess to a terrific thrill in having been able to sit in Tuesday night at the American premiere of "Peter Grimes," the opera by the Englishman, Benjamin Britten. That's another and an extraordinarily fine sample of the work that has been and can be inspired by conditions such as Dr Koussevitzky has envisioned for Tanglewood.

* * *

Well might the doctor beam as he did. He was responsible for the opera, since he commissioned Britten to do it in memory of Mrs Koussevitzky. While we can't be quite so optimistic as the good doctor about its being "next to Carmen" as a music drama, we can share his enthusiasm over the work and the thrilling performance it was given. Watch for the metropolitan impresarios and the movie moguls to start making passes at the work.

* * *

[249]

8500 Hear Opening Concert Of Final Week of Festival

New Prokofieff Symphony as Played By Boston Orchestra Reveals Russia's Contemporary Composer at His Best

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The first concert of the final week end of the ninth Berkshire Festival was played at Tanglewood last night before an audience of 8500. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, played the fifth symphony of Prokofieff, the Schumann cello concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" of Wagner and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's merry pranks, after the old-fashioned, roguish manner in rondo form."

'Apple Pie' for Orchestra

The new Prokofieff symphony, (it was first played early last year) shows Russia's leading contemporary composer at his best. It was interesting to hear, comparatively side by side, the sparkling, gay swift-moving sections of this symphony and the devil-may-care pranks of Strauss. Here, on the same program, were two of the master wits of music: Prokofieff, with his incredible facility, retaining always a bit of the debonair, never quite descending to the wise-crack; Strauss not hesitating to use a vulgar equivalent of a Bronx cheer. In any case the music of both is apple pie for the Boston orchestra and their famous conductor. They played with scintillating brilliance last night.

But the Prokofieff symphony has more than the swift second and fourth movements, allegro marcato and allegro giocoso, respectively. The first movement builds up at the end to a majestic climax, and the third movement, adagio, is moving and impressive. There is a self-confidence evident in the whole symphony. We sense that Prokofieff is sure of himself. His music shows a complete lack of self-consciousness. His nonchalance just misses a touch of swagger braggadocio.

"Till" was played with remarkable buoyancy. Indeed, probably one of Koussevitzky's most precious resources is one that Aaron Copland mentioned recently in a speech concerning his superior at the Berkshire Music Center to the effect that he never personally grows blase or bored with any music but his love for it remains new and fresh. We suppose Koussevitzky has been playing this Rondo during all the 50 years since its composition, and yet, last night, he played it with all the ardor and eager anticipation of one to whom it was a late acquaintance. The variety of nuances and the extravagant colors, however gave no suggestion of short familiarity but rather of the true years of cumulative experience he has gained. The orchestra responded with their usual alarity and superlative tone.

In the "Lohengrin" prelude there was opportunity to show a different type of their potentialities. The violins sustained the high-register phrases with gratifying fidelity, and as the other instruments, acquired en route, brought in the lower timbres until the whole gamut was encompassed, the tonal effect was gorgeous and lavish.

Mr. Piatigorsky played the slow movement of his concerto with searching beauty. He used a whisper of tone, yet in the tremendous hush which his artistry commanded, it carried with poignant intensity. Otherwise it was a tame performance of a tame concerto. His tone, when there was opportunity to sustain it, was mellifluent, but the early arpeggios and scales in the first movement were not articulated, nor was there distinction nor spirit to his performance. He was applauded with great enthusiasm and obliged to return several times to acknowledge the approval of the large audience.

Saturday evening the program will include a repetition of the Shostakovitch ninth symphony, the first performance of which in America was on the first program of the festival. This is a highly commendable policy, for it allows more people to hear it, and permits those who will have been present at both concerts to gain a degree of intimacy which, in all fairness, a rational opinion warrants.

POST

AUG 9 - 1946

Words and Music

Piatigorsky Is Soloist In Tanglewood Concert

By John Briggs

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 9—Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony last night opened the ~~final~~ series of Berkshire Festival concerts, with Gregor Piatigorsky as cello soloist.

Mr. Piatigorsky played the Schumann A Minor cello concerto. The orchestral portion of the program included a new Prokofieff Symphony, the Fifth, and two concert standbys, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the prelude to "Lohengrin."

Mr. Piatigorsky's part in the performance reflected, no doubt, the hazards of outdoor music performance. Damp night air and mountain breezes can do strange things to stringed instruments. In fact, not to waste time in getting to the point, I thought that for an artist of his eminence Mr. Piatigorsky played very badly.

Lacks Precision

In the rapid closing section of the concerto, the celebrated virtuoso's playing was often untidy. Phrases were not clean cut, and he was frequently out of tune. Many of the florid passages were simply slurred over. The clarity and precision of an exciting performance were notably absent.

Mr. Piatigorsky was at his most expressive in the "Langsam" portion of the concerto, where his rich, vibrant tone and his interpretative skill made the most of Schumann's lush melodic line.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra supplied a background for Mr. Piatigorsky which was all that could be asked in the way of ensemble and dynamic balance.

Gloomy Prokofieff

The new Prokofieff Symphony (first played last winter by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians) was written after the composer had been absent from the Symphonic field for fifteen years. It is in violent contrast to the D Major and other early symphonies. It demonstrates the same deftness in orchestration, the same skilled craftsmanship; but its content is more explosive. It is a gloomy, troubled work. Beside the sunny "classical" Symphony it is violent as an equinoctial storm.

Mr. Koussevitzky played the Prokofieff with tremendous enthusiasm, and made the most of the lyric beauty of the "Lohengrin" music. "Till Eulenspiegel" was appropriately roguish. A large audience, which packed every corner of the music shed and overflowed onto the lawn, greeted the night's doings with every sign of satisfaction.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 9 - 1946

CONCERTO GIVEN AT TANGLEWOOD

Piatigorsky Is Superb in the Schumann Work

By Willard M. Clark

LENOX, Aug. 8—Prokofieff's fifth symphony high-lighted the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tangle[redacted] first concert of the final series, made memorable not only by the performance of the Prokofieff opus, but by the magnificient performance of Schumann's "Concerto for Cello and Orchestra in A Minor" by Gregor Piatigorsky. Other numbers on the program include the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the ever-delightful "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by Strauss.

"Provoking Melodies"

The performance of Prokieff's symphony was, to say the least, exciting. With characteristic prodigality, the Russian has loaded this work with provoking melodies which are tossed back and forth among the choirs in fascinating manner. These melodies, with a bewildering array of ever-changing rhythms, combine to hold the listener enthralled. While there is plenty of Prokofieff humor, there is also a savage, somber underlying current that finds its outlet through tremendous wind passages, through a steady reiteration of accompaniment, incisive and intent. One of the loveliest, most effective moments of the symphony is heard during the lyrical episode which closes the third movement. The finale opens in a mood of quasigaiety, pure lyricism, shattered from time to time by brutal dissonances, making one aware of the warfare which lingers throughout the work. It was a superb performance, with Koussevitzky and his men revelling in [redacted] its rhythms and its beauty.

From the moment Gregor Piatigorsky strode upon the stage, swinging his cello as though it were a viola, he held the center of the stage. The Schumann concerto, which wanders melodiously throughout its length, offers opportunity for virtuoso display, but that is subservient to the broad lyric passages in which the cellist drew tones of ravishing beauty from his fabulous instrument. Tonight there was a perfect union of soloist and orchestra, a perfect unanimity of thought between soloist and conductor. No wonder that at the close a veritable ovation was given all concerned.

Leaves for Recording

We are told that immediately after the performance, Piatigorsky left for New York to start recordings for his role in the film production "Carnegie Hall." He will play the famous cello solo, "The Swan," by Saint-Saens, and his instrument will be projected against a musical background of 10 harps.

Koussevitzky's reading of the prelude from "Lohengrin" is too well known to need extended comment. How wonderfully the strings sing! Surely there are none finer than the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert closed with a delightful performance of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." It is hard to believe that this work had its first performance some 51 years ago. Its melodies are so fresh, so smart, its rhythms so exciting that it might have been written yesterday. There is no need to know the story. From the introduction to the portentous descending interval of the rogue's condemnation, every action is mirrored in the music. The performance was superb, rich in comedy and contrasts, a performance to be a cherished memory.

The program Saturday night will include a repeat performance of the ninth symphony of Shostakovitch; William Schuman's "American Festival Overture"; the "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra" by Martino, played by Mischa Elman, and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

AUG 9 - 1946

Hunts Okla. Bandit Pai

Walters, Okla., Aug. 9—Two men believed to be the bandits who escaped with $40,000 in a Walters bank holdup yesterday hijacked a Texas motorist near here early today and were at-the season.

It is not too many years ago since seasons were expected to end in late April or early May, and while there were a few hardy organizations that programmed summer music, it was largely fare drawn from the Strauss family, the Herberts, the Sousas and the Rombergs.

Programs as uncompromising as the all-Brahms week which the Berkshire festival offered this past week at Tanglewood were generally unheard of. But Dr Koussevitzky has helped make this section of the state, and even of the country, as stern in its standards as Boston itself. The Bostonians have worked painstakingly to make music a year around diet, and certainly the audiences that have overflowed the Tanglewood shed on every occasion bespeak a wonderful success.

There's a great expectancy in looking forward to the Beethoven Ninth symphony which ends the festival Sunday, but we must confess to a terrific thrill in having been able to sit in Tuesday night at the American premiere of "Peter Grimes," the opera by the Englishman, Benjamin Britten. That's another and an extraordinarily fine sample of the work that has been and can be inspired by conditions such as Dr Koussevitzky has envisioned for Tanglewood.

* * *

Well might the doctor beam as he did. He was responsible for the opera, since he commissioned Britten to do it in memory of Mrs Koussevitzky. While we can't be quite so optimistic as the good doctor about its being "next to Carmen" as a music drama, we can share his enthusiasm over the work and the thrilling performance it was given. Watch for the metropolitan impresarios and the movie moguls to start making passes at the work.

* * *

'THE RAPE OF LUCRETIA'

By ERNEST NEWMAN

THERE can be no actual comparison, of course, between two operas so different both in subject and in form as "Peter Grimes" and "The Rape of Lucretia"; but for all that I must register my impression that Mr. Britten's second opera does not fulfil all the expectations set up in us by his first, and most of the blame for this I would lay on the libretto. The dramatic technique of dispensing with virtually all the usual stage action by leaving it to a "Chorus" (in the antique sense of the word) to describe for us the course of events, a Chorus which, standing as it does outside space and time, has the privilege of commenting philosophically on not only the before but the after of the events, was put to great use in André Obey's drama "Le Viol de Lucrèce" (1931). Mr. Ronald Duncan's procedure runs parallel to a great extent with that of his predecessor in this field, and a comparison of the two works where they resemble each other is not generally to his advantage.

I hasten to add that his text is in several respects excellent; and those of us who have suffered in the past from the strange jargon known as "librettists' English" are delighted to find that opera composers are at last going to men of letters for their material. The trouble with Mr. Duncan, as I see it, is that, being over-conscious of the fact that he is a man of letters, he feels himself under the constant necessity of being "literary." Many of his carefully carpentered images creak as we read them; they creak still more when they are sung, for the heightening of our sensibilities by music makes us much more critical of a dubious line in song or opera than we are when it is only read or spoken.

I must confess my astonishment that Mr. Britten, with his generally superfine sensitiveness in these matters, did not foresee the effect that some of Mr. Duncan's lines would have on us when we heard them sung. We feel, even when we read them, that such flowers of speech as "So will my little vase contain The sun's exuberance slaked with rain," or "So will my pretty vase enclose The sun's extravagance which is the rose" are not really poetry but only shop samples of "poetic diction"; but when they are sung by a couple of servant girls as they arrange Lucretia's flowers we cannot repress a smile. And the smile is apt to become a titter, as it did all round me at Glyndebourne the other evening, when the selfsame damsels, forgetting their laboriously acquired literary manners, drop into such colloquialisms as "Oh! What a lovely morning! ... It's going to be hot, unbearably hot, And I daresay it will thunder." If the Biancas and Lucias of early Rome talked as Mr. Duncan's do, how did the Mary Anns and the Mary Ellens talk?

This scene, indeed, should be recast. It is not merely that it reminds us, to its disadvantage, of the famous scene between Madam Butterfly and Suzuki; it was handled with such naïveté of technique at Glyndebourne that everyone was amused, and there should be no provocation to amusement in a tragedy like this.

If we want to see how far Mr. Duncan can sometimes fall behind his French confrère we have only to compare the different manners of the two when the Male and Female Chorus make an excursion into history. This is how M. Obey makes them read from their Book of Fate:

> Le Récitant : Lisez! Lisez! Page cinquante - deux : "Cultrum, quem sub veste abditum habebat . . ."
>
> La Récitante : Je ne comprends pas.
>
> Le Récitant : " . . . eum in corde defigit . . ."
>
> La Récitante : Je ne comprends pas. Je ne comprends pas.
>
> Le Récitant : (comme en s'excusant) : Tite-Live . . Histoire Romaine.
>
> La Récitante : Non, non, non. Cela ne s'est pas passé ainsi, avec cette pompeuse froideur. Ecoutez! . . . . (Doucement). Ecoutez! . . . (Avec tendresse). "Poor bird . . ."
>
> Le Récitant : Je ne saisis pas.
>
> La Récitante : Pauvre oiseau . . . "Poor frighted deer . . ."
>
> Le Récitant : Je ne vois pas . . .
>
> La Récitante : "Pauvre biche effrayée, qui s'arrête soudain au carrefour d'une forêt en cherchant quelle route l'éloignera des chiens, ainsi Lucrèce en proie aux meutes du doute . . ." Elle hésita, vous voyez bien, elle hésita. Elle . . . elle hésite.

M. Obey, it will be seen, not only manages to quote Livy and Shakespeare without setting up any sense of incongruity in us but relates it all poignantly to the drama. What Mr. Duncan gives us when, in the prologue to his second act, the Female Chorus reads from her Book, is a University Extension lecture:

> The prosperity of the Etruscans was due to the richness of their native soil, the virility of their men, and the fertility of their women . . . , See Virgil, Book II, verse five three four : "Sic fortis Etruria crevit" etcetera All authorities agree that the Etruscan conquest of Rome dates from 600 B.C.—that is, approximately;

and so on for nearly thirty lines packed with useful information: how many people at Glyndebourne, or even among the intelligentsia of Sadler's Wells, will have known before that "Their [the Etruscans'] passion for music was notorious (as witness [witnessed?] by the fragment of Alcimus and other references, including Eratosthenes)"? Without a knowledge of these vital facts, of course, no one's education can be considered complete; but is the opera house the best place in which to teach us them? Once more I ask myself what had become of Mr. Britten's sense of the theatre and his feeling for his tragic subject when he allowed things of this sort to go into the libretto.

I shall return next week to one or two other features of the text and have a word or two to say about the music.

THE CONTEMPORARY MUSIC FESTIVAL

The final concert last Sunday of the Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music brought us the now familiar Concerto of Bela Bartok, the racy, imaginative and thoroughly competent "Cortèges" of Alan Rawsthorne, and, on a lower slope, a violin concerto by Roman Palester (Poland) that was interesting without being exciting, and a Nocturne for Orchestra by Raymond Loucheur (France) to which it was difficult to attach the epithet "contemporary," for it smacked in almost every bar of early post-Tristanism.

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES

AUG 4 - 1946

Radio Premiere For Shostakovich Symphony

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Perform American Debut Of Eagerly-Awaited No. 9

The most important event of the current music season in this country, the long-awaited hearing of Shostakovich's latest symphony, the No. 9, will be brought to American radio listeners by the American Broadcasting company on Aug. 10, when the Boston Symphony orchestra presents its fifth and final broadcast from the Berkshire Music festival. The program will be aired here over station WSUN at 8:30 p. m.

Premiered Nov. 3, 1945, over the Moscow radio in a broadcast from Leningrad, the work attracted world-wide attention and was made a news story in the Soviet press. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, immediately moved to present the score here. The score takes 25 minutes to play. In its first performance, E. A. Mravinski was conductor. The score has not been heard outside of Russia. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct it in its American premiere.

Shostakovich's No. 9 Symphony is in five movements, all exhuberant but the fourth section, which is a largo. It has been described as "simple, unsophisticated and gay." Soviet critics style the new work as the closest Shostakovich has come to the classical school in all his writing.

BEAUMONT, TEXAS
JOURNAL

AUG 4 1946

RUSSIAN WORK TO HAVE PREMIERE

Shostakovich Symphony to Be Heard Saturday Over KFDM

An important event of the current music season in this country, the long-awaited hearing of Shostakovich's latest symphony, the No. 9 will be brought to American radio listeners by KFDM and the American Broadcasting company, Saturday, when the Boston Symphony orchestra presents its fifth and final broadcast from the Berkshire Music festival at 7:30 p. m.

Premiered November 3, 1945, over the Moscow radio in a broadcast from Leningrad, the work attracted world-wide attention and was made a news story in the Soviet press. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, immediately moved to present the score here. The new work, of 25 minutes duration, is in five movements, all exuberant but the fourth section, which is a "largo." It has been described as "simple, unsophisticated and gay."

Boys Baseball Game

KFDM has another premier and special events feature to be broadcast Saturday when it brings listeners the east and west teams in the third annual all-American boys baseball game, at 12:30 p. m. The hard-hitting determined east team, composed of the cream of junior baseball talent east of the Mississippi river, will be led by the Flying Dutchman, Honus Wagner. The 16 slugging youths from west of the Mississippi will be led by the great Ty Cobb.

The 32 men who compose these teams have been selected by sports editors of 32 leading newspapers from coast to coast. This game, called the "Mr. Big of pre-pro baseball," has been arranged to originate in Wrigley field, Chicago. Harry Wismer, sports commentator of ABC will supply the play-by-play commentary. He will be assisted by Johnnie Neblett. The 32 winners will travel to Chicago and live for a week like big leaguers, eating and sleeping baseball, batting out and sharpening up on fielding before meeting the roaring crowd on the big day.

William Bendix will be starred in "The Lucky Stiff," Craig Rice's bowling tale of a girl, supposedly electrocuted, who returns to upset a protection racket and cause some killings, when the Hour of Mystery, is heard over KFDM tonight at 8 p. m.

Anniversary Program

Marking the first anniversary of the day the atomic bomb exploded on Hiroshima, KFDM, through ABC, in co-operation with Americans United, will present "Unhappy Birthday," a special dramatic broadcast featuring Clifton Fadiman, Edna Ferber, Josh White and other outstanding personalities, Tuesday from 8 to 8:30 p. m.

Principal character in the drama is a disillusioned veteran who refuses to believe in "one world" until he is forced to realize that the atomic bomb does not recognize national boundaries.

Among the personalities who will join Miss Ferber, Fadiman and White in pointing out the message are Dr. Harrison Brown, Chicago physicist, who was a member of the Oak Ridge staff for three years, Allen Claxton, D. D., pastor of the Broadway Temple church, New York city, Merle Miller, former editor of "Yank," and James B. Carey, secretary-treasurer of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. Fadiman will narrate the program.

Town Meeting Debate

Educational facilities available to veterans will be the subject of debate on America's Town Meeting, Thursday, when the KFDM-ABC broadcast originates in the gymnasium of Rutgers university, New Brunswick, N. J., at 8:30 p. m. Taking the affirmative on the question: "Is the Veteran Getting a Square Deal in Education?" will be Dr. Raymond Walters, president of the University of Cincinnati and chairman of the educational relationships committee of the American council on education, and Donald Kingsley, director of manpower and veterans affairs of the office of war mobilization and reconversion.

Upholding the negative will be Dr. Robert B. Stewart, vice president of Purdue university and chairman of the educational advisory committee of the veterans administration, and Chat Paterson, legislative representative of the American veterans committee.

A one-man invasion of the west by that southern gentleman, Senator Claghorn, will be brought to the attention of the nation when he, Kenny Delmar, that is, visits Louella Parsons' program as the guest of her daughter, Harriet, tonight at 7:15 p. m. And along the same line of movie commentators, Jimmy Fidler goes vacationing and will remain away for four broadcasts. During his absence his place at the microphone will be taken by two well-known radio personalities, Harry Von Zell and Hall Gibney.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

AUG 4 - 1946

Koussevitzky To Introduce New Shostakovich Symphony

John Cleghorn Gets Kick Out Of Being Called Claghorn—More About 'Mike Fever' And Who It Hits

By MIKE McGEE

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY Saturday night will continue his campaign to make the American people appreciate the music of Shostakovich, when he introduces the latter's new Ninth Symphony on the air.

The Symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will be heard locally through WMPS at 7:30 p.m.

To the writer, the music of Shostakovich sou[illegible] awfully lot like thunder on the left. There are those who profess great enjoyment of it, and like olives, it seems to be an acquired taste.

Koussevitzky has long been a Shostakovich booster. He introduced his Fifth Symphony to America, and when the critics up East turned up their noses, Koussevitzky went into action. He went on tour with an orchestra and everywhere he went he played the Fifth Symphony. Finally the critics agreed that Shostakovich fellow had something.

It was not the first time Koussevitzky had gone direct to the people. He's a great believer in the people, it seems, and when a young man in Russia personally paid for an orchestra and a boat on the Volga, which he took up the river for a seriés of free concerts for the people in the villages.

So, you might as well tune in Saturday night determined to like the Shostakovich Ninth. Even if you don't, Koussevetzky will keep after you until you do.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

AUG -4 1946

Composer To Get Special Record Of Performance

Arrangements were completed last week by the American Broadcasting Company to have the radio premiere in the United States of Shostakovich's No. 9 recorded and sent to the composer at his home in Russia.

The radio premiere, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday, August 10, over WTJS-ABC, will mark the first airing of the work outside of Russia. It will be performed for the first time in the United States on July 25 when Dr. Koussevitzky presents it at the opening night of the Berkshire Music Festival's series of three festival concerts.

The new work, of 25 minutes duration, is in five movements. According to an analysis by Danie Zhitomirsky, published in th "Voks Soviet Music Chronical No 9" last year just before the worl premiere in Russia, the new sco requires an orchestra similar those used in the classic period, t instruments being paired with piccolo added.

The opening allegro is of Hayden like simplicity, with a touch of slyness and subtle irony. Shostakovich he wrote, "revives in its very essence that spirit of unrestrained and bubbling mirth which lived in the classic allegri up to Rossini's overtures."

The first theme of this movement is "rather a kind of animated motion" while "elements of buffoonery appear in the subordinate theme." In this movement the composer stresses various shades of the comedy aspect.

The second movement, a moderato, is styled as a "world of bright and romantic lyricism" which at the same time is "refined and whimsical in its outline." The third movement following the romantic mould, is a precipitious scherzo. The fourth section, a largo, was conceived as a "contrasting intermezzo between the scherzo and finale" and is a solo of improvisational character against a background of sustained chords.

In the finale, an allegretto, the composer reverts to the spirit of the first section but this has "more of buffoonery than of spontaneous gaiety.

Shostakovich, in this symphony, touched with parody and grotesqueness, recalls his first symphony, the ballet "Golden Age" and his opera "Nose." Although classic in style, even Mozartean at times, his own

---

WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD

AUG 3 1946

Boston Symphony To Play Brahms

An all-Brahms program will be presented on the second broadcast from the Berkshire Music festival, Tanglewood, Mass., today at 7:30 p. m.. over Radio Station KWNO.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the entire Boston Symphony orchestra, will present Carol Brice, contralto, as soloist. Miss Brice will be heard with a male chorus and the orchestra in Brahms' "Rhapsody, Op. 53." The concluding number will be Brahms' "Symphony No. 2."

Miss Brice first sang for Dr. Koussevitzky in February, 1946, when she was heard by "The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." He also heard her via a broadcast on which she was soloist with Fritz Reiner in De Fall's "El Amor Brujo." This lead to an audition with him and her engagement by the Friends of the Boston Symphony.

A native of Sedalia, N. C., Miss Brice attended Talladega college, where her instructors interested her in a singing career and suggested the Juilliard School of Music. Coming to New York, she won an audition for a scholarship in 1939. That same year she won a role in auditions for the "Hot Mikado."

While still a student at Juilliard school, Miss Brice won the Walter W. Naumberg award and a Town Hall recital. Her teachers arranged for Dr. Koussevitzky to hear her and a special concert was held at Pittsfield, near Tanglewood, but Dr. Koussevitzky unfortunately could not come.

Today, however, Miss Brice will reach Tanglewood and sing under the direction of the Boston conductor. Along the way have been appearances with the Pittsburgh Symphony, the Kansas City Philharmonic, the New Haven Symphony, the CBS Symphony, and a trancontinental concert tour.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

AUG 9 - 1946

Shostakovich Ninth Symphony Has 1st U.S. Broadcast Tomorrow

Dimitri Shostakovich's ninth symphony will have its American radio premiere tomorrow evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts it over the ABC network, and CFCF, at 9.30 p.m. The new work, which will be conducted tomorrow by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was first presented in Leningrad on November 3, 1945, and created a stir in the musical world.

DMITRI SHOSTAKOVICH

The 9th Symphony is in five movements, all exuberant but the fourth section, which is a largo. It has been described by Robert Magidof of the New York Times Magazine staff as "simple, unsophisticated and gay." Magidof was one of four who heard the composer play it on the piano a few hours after he had completed it.

Soviet critics style the new work as the closest Shostakovich has come to the classical school in all his writing. It is in direct contrast to much of his previous output and is youthfully exuberant and thoroughly happy in style.

The "new" style of the composer is said to be due to the fact that while he was writing the No. 9, he and a fellow composer, Dimitri Kabalevsky, whose scores have also been heard over ABC under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton, spent their evenings playing Haydn symphonies on the piano. The work was written in the rest home of the Soviet Composers Union near Ivanovo. The two composers varied their Haydn diet with occasional Mozart and Beethoven works.

Because Shostakovich was occupied with State examinations at the Moscow Conservatory, where he is professor of composition, the first movement took six weeks to complete. He finished the second movement in a week, the third in eight days, while the fourth and fifth movements took five days each.

The score takes 25 minutes to play. In its first performances, E. A. Mravinski was the conductor. The score had not been heard outside of Russia until Dr. Koussevitzky gave it a pre-broadcast performance on the opening night of the festival concerts at Tanglewood on July 25.

AKRON, OHIO
BEACON JOURNAL

AUG 9 - 1946

AROUND THE DIAL

Shostakovich Work Premieres

Boston Symphony Plays Piece On Final Program

By BEE OFFINEER, Radio Editor

DMITRI SHOSTAKOVICH

........premiere symphony

MOST IMPORTANT event of the current music season in this country, the long-awaited hearing of Dmitri Shostakovich's latest symphony, the No. 9, comes to radio listeners on Saturday evennig. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky introduces the work during the final broadcast of the season of the Boston Symphony at 8:30 over WAKR.

Score for the symphony left Moscow on May 16 by plane to Batumi. There it was placed aboard a Soviet ship to be transported across the Black sea to Odessa. An American Victory ship finally received the precious manuscript for delivery to New York.

The Ninth Symphony is in five movements and takes 25 minutes to play. It has been described as "simple, unsophisticated and gay."

In addition to the Shostakovich work, the symphony will play Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture."

* * *

GOING FROM THE sublime, to something else again ...... Another mystery story rejoins the network schedules tonight when the "Thin Man"—sophisticated sleuth Nick and his jealous wife, Nora—resume their activities after a summer recess ...... They'll be heard at 7:30 p. m. over WADC.

"The Case of the Talking Shoe," the opener, concerns the return of the Charles family from vacation to find their apartment occupied by a girl-crazy inventor ...... Because a few gangsters and their molls have cultivated a grasping interest in science, Nick and Nora are compelled to shoot their way back to a semblance of normal living.

Claudia Morgan and Les Damon, who have played the leading roles since the series started five years ago, are co-starred again.

* * *

PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT

AUG 9 - 1946

RADIO DAY BY DAY

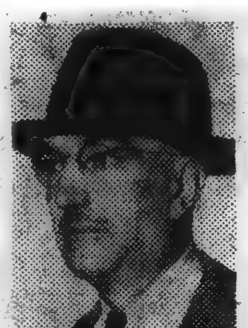
Shostakovich's New Symphony Premiere



R. M. Shepherdson

By R. M. SHEPHERDSON
(Radio Editor, The Peoria Journal)

The highlight of the current music season in this country, the long awaited hearing of Shostakovich's latest symphony, the No. 9 will be brought to American radio listeners by the American Broadcasting Co. network when the Boston Symphony orchestra presents its fifth and final broadcast from the Berkshire music festival at 8:30 o'clock tomorrow night. WCFL will carry the event. Premiered Nov. 3, 1945 over the Moscow radio, the work attracted world wide attention. At that time Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston conductor, made plans to present the score in this country and will direct tomorrow night's radio premiere in this country.

Shostakovich

The opening allegro of Shostakovich's new work is of Haydn-like simplicity with a touch of slyness and subtle irony, a description reports. The second movement, a moderato, is styled as a "world of bright and romantic lyricism" which at the same time is "refined and whimsical in its outline." The third movement, following the romantic mould, is a precipitous scherzo and the fourth section, a largo, was conceived as a "contrasting intermezzo between the scherzo and finale" and is a solo of improvisational character against a background of sustained chords. In the finale, an allegretto, the composer reverts to the spirit of the first section but this has "more buffoonery than of spontaneous gaiety." The symphony is in E-Flat Minor.

Tomorrow night's concert by the Boston Symphony will also include Tschaikowsky's familiar "1812 Overture."

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

AUG 8 - 1946

ROCKY CLARK'S
LISTENING POST

Shostakovich 9th Ends Boston Series

With the radio premiere of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9, the Boston Symphony completes its broadcasting season over WNAB-ABC Saturday night at 9:30 when Serge Koussevitsky conducts an all-Russian pro[illegible] In addition to the Shostakovich work, Tchaikovsky's familiar "1812 Overture" will be presented.

Next week, replacing the Boston concerts, the WNAB-ABC network will introduce a new program "American Melodies" from 10 to 10:30 p.m., Saturdays. Featuring the American Broadcasting Symphony orchestra and guest conductors, the series will start off with Josef Stopak on the podium [illegible]

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

JUL 2 8 1946

Shostakovich's New Symphony Will Be Heard For First Time In America On Aug. 10 Via ABC

BY LILY MAY CALDWELL
Music and Art Editor

The most important event of the current music season in this country, the long-awaited hearing of Shostakovich's latest symphony, the No. 9, will be brought to American radio listeners by the American Broadcasting Company on Aug. 10, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents its fifth and final broadcast from the Berkshire Music Festival. The festival will be heard over Station WSGN.

Premiered No. 3, 1945, over the Moscow radio in a broadcast from Leningrad, the work attracted world-wide attention and was made a news story in the Soviet press. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, immediately moved to present the score here. Arrangements were completed when the American Broadcasting Company received the rights to give the score its American radio premiere.

Ever since the Soviet composer presented his Symphony No. 7, it was reported that he planned a trilogy to commemorate the war and finally victory. The tragic color of the No. 7 and No. 8 was to be contrasted with the Victory idea of the No. 9. Shostakovich admitted the original idea, but is said now to regard the No. 9 as a "bridge" toward another work. He has said that it was written after three attempts, although the idea came to him in 1943, two years after completion of the No. 8.

The 9th Symphony is in five movements, all exuberant, but the fourth section, which is a "largo." It has been described by Robert Magidof, of The New York Times Magazine staff, as "simple, unsophisticated and gay." Magidof was one of four who heard the composer play it on the piano a few hours after he had completed it.

* * *

SOVIET CRITICS style the new work as the closest Shostakovich has come to the classical school in all his writing. It is in direct contrast to much of his previous output and is youthfully exuberant and thoroughly happy in style.

The "new" style of the composer is said to be due to the fact that while he was writing the No. 9, he and a fellow composer, Dimitri Kabalevsky, whose scores also have been heard over ABC under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton, spent their evenings playing Haydn symphonies on the piano. The work was written in the rest home of the Soviet composers' union near Ivanovo. The two composers varied their Haydn diet with occasional Mozart and Beethoven works.

Because Shostakovich was occupied with state examinations at the Moscow Conservatory where he is professor of composition, the first movement took six weeks to complete. He finished the second movement in a week, the third in eight days, while the fourth and fifth movements took five days each.

The score takes 25 minutes to play. In its first performances, Ravinski was the conductor. The score has not been heard outside of Russia. Dr. Koussevitzky plans a pre-broadcast performance on the opening night of the Festival concerts at Tanglewood.

The Aug. 10 broadcast, last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra radio presentations for the current season, will be heard from 7:30 p.m. to 8:30 p.m.

ANNISTON, ALA.
STAR

AUG 9 - 1946

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will conclude its activities for the current season in its program Saturday night over the ABC network. Its concluding program will be heard from 7:30 to 8:30 o'clock.

Next Saturday night a new program, American Melodies, will replace the Boston Symphony Orchestra, taking the last half of the hour now occupied by the Bostonians, 8 to 8:30 o'clock. The new program will feature the American Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra and guest conductors. For the first three programs, the initial one to be Saturday, August 17, Joseph Stopak will be on the podium. Outstanding instrumentalists of the orchestra will be featured as soloists.

Sam Spade, the redoubtable private eye, pulls a surprise on his fans by calling in the police during the case of "Death and Company," to be dramatized over ABC tonight at 9 o'clock. It happens when Spade's sometime friend, Police Lieutenant Duddes, gets on the trail of a woman's kidnapers in his usual bull-like fashion while Spade probes elsewhere.

Sportscasters Don Dunphy and Bill Corum will describe the eight-round welterweight bout between Tony Pellone and Ruby Kessler in Madison Square Garden, beginning at 8 o'clock tonight, over WHMA through the ABC network. Both Pellone, a New York lad with a hard punch, and Kessler, from Coney Island, are noted for their ring knowledge and fast pace. This is the regular Cavalcade of Sports broadcast.

PARKESBURG, W.VA
NEWS
8/4/46

MUSIC

By Richard Suter

Valuable Violincello

When the ranking cellist Gregor Piatigorsky joins with violinist Erica Morini to play Brahms' Double Concerto with the Boston Symphony orchestra today at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, he will introduce to the concert public one of the few surviving perfect violincelli made by Stradivari, the fabulous 250-year-old "Lord Aylesford" instrument.

Piatigorsky acquired the "Lord Aylesford" only a few weeks ago through America's best known instrument dealer, Emil Herrmann, at a price not disclosed but rumored to be as high as any ever paid for a cello.

According to the legend attached to the precious old instrument, the "Lord Aylesford" was made by Antonio Stradivari in Cremona in 1696. Of all the instruments made by Stradivari, 540 violins, 12 violas and 50 celli are actually known today. Less than 10 of the celli are in perfect condition, and the "Lord Aylesford" is considered to be one of the finest of these.

Richard Suter

The instrument was brought from Italy to London in 1780 and there it was bought by Lord Aylesford, whose name has become associated with it. Later it passed into other private hands. Its latest owner died in 1941 and eventually, after long negotiations with the family, Emil Herrmann was able to obtain it for Piatigorsky.

Dream Fulfilled

The noted virtuoso says owning the "Lord Aylesford" is the fulfillment of a lifelong dream. When he first came to this country almost 17 years ago, a brilliant cellist in his mid-twenties, Emil Herrmann told him: "There is a cello in the world made just for you. But it is impossible to get it. It is not for sale." Piatigorsky said art was long—he would wait.

Meanwhile, in London in 1934, through the internationally famous dealers, W. E. Hill and Sons, Piatigorsky bought the fabulous 1739 Montagnana, which he has used ever since. When he got it, it had not been played in almost a century. It had been buried in an English country estate in a collection of rare instruments. Piatigorsky affectionately named it his "Sleeping Princess' because it took him so long to "awaken' it.

Early this July, in Philadelphia, Piatigorsky received a telephone call from Emil Herrmann. He said, "It's here.". It was 11:30 in the morning. At noon he was on a train for New York; at 2 p.m. on 57th St. Five minutes later, in Herrmann's old-world workshop, the cello was put into his hands. Another ten minutes and he had bought it.

That night, Piatigorsky admits he never slept. With the lamp shining on the cello's luminous chestnut surface, he alternately looked and played. "Never," he says, "have I seen or heard anything more beautiful."

Heard by Public

Besides playing the Brahms Double Concerto today with Erica Morini, whose violin is the "Davidoff" Stradivari, Piatigorsky will use his new instrument again at Tanglewood under Koussevitzky on Thursday evening, August 8, in the Schumann Cello Concerto. Concertgoers of the country will hear it when Piatigorsky tours next season. Film fans will see as well as hear it before long in the motion picture "Carnegie Hall" in which Gregor Piatigorsky will be featured with other great stars of the music world.

And so another string virtuoso joins the rank of those playing rare Stradivari instruments. This appears to be the goal of all of them, but of course even Stradivari instruments vary in worth and sometimes, as in Piatigorsky's case, the coveted violin or viola or cello is not immediately available.

Sometimes, too, a virtuoso likes to play a little trick on the public, as when William Primrose, the world's ranking violist, announced last season he had replaced his valuable Stradivari instrument on certain programs with a modern instrument, made for him in recent months by a man in Philadelphia.

Collector's Instinct

No one had noticed the difference. Indeed, hearing both instruments at the same time left little means of detecting the substitution for any but experts. The test can be made in anyone's living room by recordings, by comparing Primrose's early records, that of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" for instance, with his later releases, such as the recently issued single disk of Shubert's "Litany" and Bach's "Come, Sweet Death."

But any collector will tell you that isn't the point. It is the rarity and high worth of the antique violins and celli made by Stradivari, their historical associations, that make them so eagerly sought as solo instruments or as cornerstones in collections of rare instruments.

It is the same instinct that prompts some record collectors to seek through dusty attics and second-hand stores for examples of the technically imperfect disks made forty years ago or more by exponents of the "Golden Age of Song.' It was only vocal records that sound even approximately like the originals, for the various instruments and orchestras had to wait for the introduction of electrical recording for adequate reproduction.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

AUG 8 - 1946

Words and Music

Berkshire Festival Pays Off, Thanks to Shed and Location

By John Briggs

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 7—The Berkshire Music Festivals violate every precedent of concert activity by being entirely self-supporting.

The festival concerts lost money during their first two seasons, 1934 and 1935. Thereafter every year they have broken even or better.

The fact is significant in this time when a majority of American symphony orchestras are economically behind the eight-ball. Conductors and soloists may come and go, but deficits recur with mournful regularity.

The reason can be stated in a sentence. Musical performances are expensive. Musicians are highly paid technicians, and rightly so, I think. They are entitled to salaries commensurate with the years of arduous labor they have put in to learn their trade.

But by the same token their expensive talents may consume all the money that comes into the box-office, and more. The space available in our concert halls is a sharply limiting factor. There are just so many seats in Carnegie Hall; when these are taken the S.R.O. sign goes up, even though the demand continues. If the concert is a turkey, the case is just opposite; all supply and no demand.

Sly From Subsidy

In Europe the non-lucrative nature of music has long been taken for granted. Most orchestras and opera companies have operated with the aid of a municipal or government subsidy for generations. In this country we are still too independent and too suspicious of anything that savors of bureaucratic control to take kindly to frankly subsidized music. Instead our orchestras run up impressive deficits and then put the bite on their wealthiest subscriber, which is at least a more subtle way of doing it.

Therefore it is interesting to discover that Mr. Kousevitzky and his Bostonians have found a way of making music that pays off.

I think the Berkshire Festival's blue-chip assets are its geographic location and its auditorium.

The latter, the $100,000 "music shed" is an acoustical marvel. It covers an acre of ground; but sound isn't dissipated in its vast interior. In every seat you can hear a whisper on the stage. There is almost no limit to the number of paid admissions that can be accommodated; and since the fan-shaped structure radiates sound outward, the lawn behind is essentially part of theatre. All summer the shed had drawn houses of 8,000 to 11,000, which at a four-dollar top is a handsome gross, indeed.

The geographic factor is no less important. The festival is relatively inaccessible. It is hard to get here. It is almost impossible to find a place to stay after you arrive. It is awkward to get around at the festival except by walking four to six miles daily. It is difficult to secure food and all the eating places are packed to the doors.

All that, of course, adds up to an almost irresistible psychological lure for music lovers. Every successful music festival has made it tough for the customers. In the old days people used to travel thousands of miles to Salzburg in order to be compelled to fight for occupancy of a decrepit room with bath across the street. Lenox is not as bad as Salzburg, but it is shrewdly inconvenient. If coming up did not involve a certain amount of trouble, people would not think it was worth the trouble to come.

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

AUG 3 - 1946

New and Old Music At Berkshire Festival

One of the main features of the first series in this year's Berkshire Festival was the American premiere of the ninth symphony of Shostakovitch. The new symphony must have given Shostakovitch fans the surprise of their lives. In the composer's own words, "it is a merry little piece" with which one hardly associates the uneasy quasi-descriptiveness, the pathos which passed for tragedy, the whole "sound and fury" of his two preceding works. True, the conspicuous use of the percussion section lends this work, too, a faintly military aspect — but it evokes a vision of tin soldiers rather than the Red Army . . .

The work is short and, though by no means superficial, it is deliberately light and humorous. It has been said that it breathes the atmosphere of an early Haydn symphony, and certainly the forms of the various movements are easy enough to comprehend even at first hearing. The three fast movements are lively and gay, and full of surprises such as the second theme of the first movement, the sauciness of which drew gasps from the audience.

The most recognisable parts of the work are a long Moderato and a very short Largo, both of which belong to the purest manifestations of this composer's genius for melody. Their sparse orchestration serves to stress the peculiar beauty and simplicity of his melodic line. In spite of its length, the Moderato gives strong support to those who call Shostakovitch the most gifted of contemporary composers. The work was enthusiastically received and will probably become very well known — although many listeners are doomed to disappointment at further hearings, for it will be hard for any orchestra to equal the standard of this first performance.

The concert opened with an astounding reading of Beethoven's Third Symphony. One who believed in tags might name it the American Eroica: a soaring, rhapsodic song of overwhelming beauty, without even a hint of tragedy or despair. It is impossible to imagine that anything could surpass this performance in magnificence of sound. It made one not care if Wagner and Strauss ever lived. And if many of the things were left unsaid which to the initiate seem the core of the work, yet the performance did not fail to convince and satisfy. The beauty and grandeur of the work remained unimpaired; it merely became more human and less catholic.

Beethoven's Pastorale, opening work of the second evening, stood in perfect contrast. Played with cool objectivity, it sounded very gay and charming, sparkling, but never boisterous or crude. This performance made much of the transparency of texture and form which is so noticeable in works of the Romantic period, although the speed at which the second movement was taken made it sound the least bit untidy now and then. This same excessive speed impaired enjoyment of the corner movements of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony which opened the third program. They sounded much more trite than they really are, and somewhat ragged to boot. The middle movements, however, did more than make up for them. They were exquisite.

The last major work of this series was Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony, and a more stirring performance of it will surely never be heard. It was especially interesting to note that Koussevitzkyk took very few liberties with the tempi as indicated in the score, and that he made only one small change in phrasing. Thus he proved that — contrary to wide-spread opinion — even in such a work as this, the music may be left to speak for itself without losing its expressive qualities.

Of the smaller works included in the various programs, Copeland's "Appalachian Spring" Suite was the most interesting. This is a new and different Copeland, in an almost romantic vein and surprisingly tonal. Other works heard were Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" (2) and excerpts from Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in Ravel's beautiful orchestration. There was also an (utterly) ineffectual rendition of Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto by Eugene List.

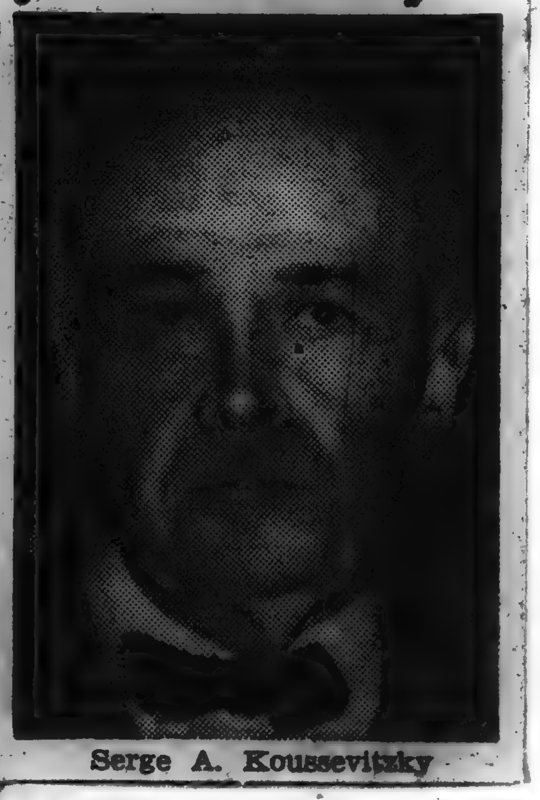
In these concerts the honours were shared equally by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was a great and profound musician directing an orchestra that defies description. Surely it is as close as anything can be to the ideal orchestra of which conductors dream — but, of course, it is also the only orchestra that has had the same great man to train it and lead it for a quarter of a century.

K. Schultz.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

AUG 4 - 1946

Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony To Be Premiered By Koussevitzky



Serge A. Koussevitzky

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the radio premiere of Dimitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony during his broadcast from the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., over WPOR at 9.30 p. m. Saturday.

Next Saturday's broadcast over ABC will mark the first radio performance of the new symphony outside of Russia. It was performed for the first time in the Western Hemisphere when Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony presented it at the first Berkshire concert on July 26.

An audience of 8,000 persons extended a warm reception to the new work at its premiere then. Now it will be offered to the listening public of the entire Nation.

The Associated Press termed the new Shostakovich work as "light and gay throughout with a few pensive but not tragic moments." The Russian composer's latest symphony runs about 20 minutes, something of an innovation as his Seventh and Eighth were nearer an hour long.

Of the Shostakovich Ninth, Daniel Zhitomirsky, Russian reviewer, wrote: "The work revives in its very essence that spirit of unrestrained and bubbling mirth which lived in the classic allegri up to Rossini's overtures."

Arrangements have been completed by ABC to have the radio premiere recorded and sent to the composer at his home in Russia.

The broadcast will offer a study in contrasts in Russian musical expression as Dr. Koussevitzky also has listed Tchaikovsky's 1812 overture.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

AUG 4 - 1946

Berkshire Broadcas Feature Shostak

MUSICAL news from the Berkshire Festival in Stockbridge, Mass., outranks anything else again this week. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first American radio performance of Dmitri Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 9 Saturday night at 9:30 over WFCI.

The work, latest by the Russian composer, had its premiere performance in Russia only last Winter. In contrast to the composer's seventh and eighth symphonies, this one is light-hearted and playful.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

AUG 5 - 1946

Koussevitzky Tanglewood School Most Successful Of Series

By Helen Havener

NEW YORK, Aug. 5—This copy is written in part from New York City and in part from Tanglewood in the Berkshires where Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is conducting the [illegible] of all his summer music schools. It will not bring as late news as might be desired of the wonderful Brahms Festival which is occupying the attention of Berkshire visitors this week because there are no airmails from this part of the Country, and train mails leave too early on Saturday to make it possible to recount Saturday events.

But it will, it is hoped, convey something of the flavor of this mammoth enterprise, in an otherwise quiet and exceedingly prosperous Berkshire town where every house seems freshly painted, every lawn is clipped smooth and every garden in fullest bloom.

The first thing that impresses one is that every person under 25 seems to have a violin case in hand or a sheaf of music under his or her arm. And their rapt interest at the concerts on rehearsals is an inspiration to see. Obviously they mean to get everything out of the Summer that both curriculum and atmosphere afford.

As for the attitude of the visitors, they are worshippers to almost the same extent as the students. They, too, talk of music in hushed whispers and with bated breath. They, too, race from concert to concert. And over all the proceedings, benignly smiling, presides that genius of the baton, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

In the diningroom of the Hotel Curtis, where almost every festivalite who possibly can secure accommodations does so, one glimpses a roster of New York's musical Who's Who, for the music-minded population of America's metropolis turns out almost en masse. At an adjoining table may be Erica Morini, whom New York critics have dubbed "the first lady of the violin." At another is genial Pierre Luboshutz and his wife, Genia Nemenoff, the duo-pianists who, if memory serves, were among the popular artists of the 1945-1946 season in Portland. Here is Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell (Elizabeth Mitchell), whose "Music with a Feather Duster" a few years ago engaged far more than passing interest. And at a table not far away sits Mrs. Elbridge Gerry Chadwick, longtime patron of all worthwhile musical events in New York, and currently engaged in helping Mrs. Winthrop W. Aldrich, wife of the Chase National Bank official, to entertain United Nations celebrities quartered in New York.

his is the busiest Summer the Berkshire Music Center has seen and it is swarming with students. The president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, Mrs. Guy P. Gannett, is here to discuss plans for the building of a summer studio at Tanglewood on the site of the "Little Red House" where Hawthorne wrote The House of Seven Gables and Tanglewood Tales. This was an early war project of the Federation and was postponed because of lack of building materials. One of the first questions Mrs. Gannett asked of George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was "Do you need the studio still?" and Judd's reply was "Why we've set up tents to accommodate the students." So the "Little Red House" will go on.

Sunday evening, to a selected group at the annual Members Night of the Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield, Dr. Koussevitzky outlined some of the aims of Tanglewood. What he is doing with students in the fields of orchestra, chamber music, composition, conducting, is reasonably well known, and also about his opera department. Here, however he defined with especial clarity what is being attempted. Three 19th century composers, he said, made an effort to bring about a change in opera, to evolve in place of the more stilted type of presentation a fusion of music and drama. They were Moussorgsky, Wagner and Bizet. Their three great experiments along this line were instanced as Boris Godunoff, Tristan and Isolde, and Carmen. Two of the three failed. Moussorgsky, Dr. Koussevitzky said concentrated on the stage, and neglected the drama in the orchtra. Wagner transferred the drama to the orchestra. Bizet alone succeeded in combining the two into what is perhaps the finest music drama to date. Tanglewood hopes to develop and apply to all opera appropriate to such treatment something of the technique of Bizet.

Two other objectives he recited for Tanglewood—the establishment of a Greek Theater and erection of an outdoor amphitheater that will seat 25,000 persons and avoid the present overflow.

So much for Tanglewood, with the joy of the Brahms recitals yet to come. And now to shift the spotlight to New York where the end of the stadium concerts season approaches—a season that should bring joy to everyone, for not only have the audiences been large, but in the main the weatherman has smiled upon the enterprise, and for all al fresco events this means the difference between bankruptcy and at least breaking even.

Ballet held the boards during the early part of the week, with the incomparable Alicia Markova and Anton Dolin as the stellar figures. A group of Chopin numbers in which Miss Markova soloed to the A Major prelude, and collaborated with Dolin in the C Sharp Minor waltz was one of the most popular.

Other offerings greatly enjoyed were a solo by Dolin inspired by a lithograph of the famous Vestris, and a Pas de Quatre celebrating the instance in 1845 when four great dancers, Taglioni, Cerito, Grisi and Grahn, danced for Queen Victoria, the only occasion in the lifetime of the four when they could be persuaded to dance together. The Markova-Dolin version of Tschaikowsky's Nutcracker Suite was the concluding ballet number. A capacity house greeted the dancers.

Stadium fans are waiting eagerly the midweek event in which Maggie Teyte and Ezio Pinza will appear together.

REPUBLICAN

AUG 5 - 1946

DOUBLE CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, 'CELLO AT TANGLEWOOD

Erica Morini and Gregor Piatigorsky Are Soloists in Closing Concert in the Brahms Cycle

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, Aug. 4—The closing concert in the Brahms cycle by the Boston orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky this afternoon at Tanglewood was of exceptional interest in that it presented the rarely heard double concerto for violin and violincello. The soloists were Erica Morini, a great favorite in Springfield, and Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, who is a member of the Music center faculty. It usually takes a festival or some such special occasion to ressurrect this work, for in truth its difficulties are formidable, and as a show piece it is not particularly grateful to the soloists. One misses the long sweeping phrases so characteristic of the composer, nor does one find any of the expansive bravura, even in the finale, which abounds in his other works, and is always so rewarding of the performer. In fact this composition, the master's last orchestral work, composed two years after his last symphony is a product of his mature musical intellect rather than an expression of the emotions. In form, a modern adaptation of the "concerto grosso," it has been called a symphony with a double obbligato.

It is a work requiring two consumate virtuosi. Fortunately these demands were well filled in this afternoon's remarkable performance, for Mr Piatigorsky's violinistic tone in the delicate approach to his instrument, blended perfectly with that of Miss Morini. Representing a combination of chamber and orchestral music, one had to keep readjusting one's ear in degree, but the classical passages for the two solo instruments in the "Allegro" in which the composer pays homage to Viotti, carried clearly through the large shed, there was a subtle tonal ensemble in the happy "Andante," and in spite of the conservative form, spirits ran high in the Vivace non troppo." It was a major musical event hearing two such gifted artists merge their talents in the performance of such a composition in combination with our favorite orchestra. The artists reaped a well-deserved ovation, in which Dr Koussevitzky and the men of the orchestra joined.

Fine Instrumentation

The concert opened with one of the master's early orchestral works, "Variations on a Theme of Joseph Haydn," probably more familiar to the majority in the composer's arrangement for two pianos. In this series of variations, truly marvelous examples of instrumentation, memorable was the graceful "Siciliano" in which the shepherd like flute tones created a realistic pastoral mood.

For the closing number Dr Koussevitzky reserved what is perhaps the most heroic, the most appealing, and surely the most popular of the master's works in the symphonic form the great "Symphony No. 1 in C Minor" opus 68. It was a real festival performance of this monumental opus in which the rich sonorities of the orchestra held the audience spellbound from the mounting theme of the first movement to the richly orchestrated chorale of the "Finale." This writer has never heard a more thrilling performance of thsi symphony. The ovation for Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra was tremendous, as it should have been for one who had the imagination and courage to play the four symphonies as well as other major compositions of Brahms in three concerts.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

AUG 2 - 1946

ARRAU, CHILEAN PIANIST, PLAYS AT TANGLEWOOD

Gives Brilliant and Highly Efficient Interpretation of Brahms Concerto With Boston Orchestra

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, Aug. 1 — The second week of the Berkshire festival concerts devoted exclusively to the works of Brahms began tonight, introducing for the first time in this setting the gifted Chilean pianist, Claudio Arrau, who was heard in the [illegible] Concerto No. 1 in D minor." This tempestuous composition, first planned as a symphony, written when the composer was but 26, and such a dismal failure at its first performance but now accepted as a masterpiece in this form, was given a brilliant and highly efficient interpretation by Mr Arrau.

The soloist sustained the tragic mood of the opening "Maestoso" so full of conflicting passions, giving pianistic drive to its poignant themes and dramatic values. If one missed somewhat the true Brahmsian depth of the feeling in the tender "Adagio" which the composer marked "Benedictus qui venit in nomine Dei," the pianist compensated for this lack in his expert playing of the final "Rondo," which was neatly crisp, spirited and vitalized by a brilliant virtuoso style. The audience gave the artist a flattering reception.

Sharing fully in the success was the superlatively fine playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr Koussevitzky's sympathetic hand. The subject for muted strings and the following one for clarinets at the opening of the slow movement were moments of unforgettable beauty, to mention but one portion of an outstanding performance.

"Tragic Overture" Played

The concerto was prefaced by the epic "Tragic Overture" opus 81, in which the orchestra contrasted with skill the reflective, brooding theme of the opening with the second, of a more prevailing optimism, bringing out the full dramatic power of both.

Dr. [illegible] chosen to play the four symphonies of Brahms in the reverse order to that in which they were written, so tonight's program concluded with No. 4 in E minor. This work in the grand manner representing the mellow outpouring of the composer's maturity, dramatic and contemplative in turn, in its cross rhythms and surging phrases, mounted to a thrilling climax.

The orchestra was revealing, too, in the quiet, melodic beauty of the "Andante moderato" in which the inner Brahms lyricism is once again to the fore. There was a youthful rebound in the spirited "Allegro giocoso" with its gay themes and rhythmic juxtapositions. It was a virtuoso performance of what is generally acknowledged one of the greatest finales ever penned. Consisting of 31 variations on a chaconne from Bach's cantata No. 150, the composer explores the possibilities of the modern orchestra in an idiom expressive of his mature genius. It was a dynamic performance arousing the audience to a prolonged demonstration of applause.

AUG 5 - 1946

Berkshire Music Festival Delights Brahms' Followers

First Symphony, Double Concerto, Morini, Piatigorsky Sunday P. M. Features

Lenox, Aug. 5—Two splendid soloists and the finest of fine cellos joined in the music-making at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon as the Boston Symphony brought its series of all-Brahms concerts to a brilliant conclusion.

The occasion for soloists and new cello was a performance of the Brahms double concerto for violin and violincello, a work seldom heard in these or any other parts. The soloists were Erica Morini, who has brought joy to thousands of Springfield listeners, and Gregor Piatigorsky, considered by many the outstanding cellist today. The cello was Piatigorsky's new "Lord Aylsford," which was being heard in concert performance for the first time.

A great audience was on hand to greet soloists and orchestra and to hear the familiar "Variations on a theme by Haydn" and first symphony two popular and ever pleasureful works which completed the program. It has become standard operating procedure to report of "great" audiences at Tanglewood, but yesterday's was outstanding. They showed their appreciation of the intricacies and tremendous difficulties of the double concerto, clearly revealed, and they thrilled in a rousing ovation to Serge Koussevitzky and he members of the orchestra at the conclusion of the symphony.

Not Easy Listening

The "Variations" happen to be one of this listener's favorites. In occupying the leadoff position on yesterday's program, it was ready and able to set a fast pace for the works to follow. Suffice it to say that the performance met all expectations; that each variation on the graceful, opening melody emerged in shining beauty.

What followed was by no means easy listening. The double concerto calls for outstanding musicianship; at the same time, the audience is required to be fully alert if it is to catch all that soloists and orchestra have to say. Miss Morini and her partner had the requisite talents and understanding; their teamwork was perfection itself, and Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave their usual superb assistance.

On the performers' side, in brief, nothing was left to be desired. That the audience could not grasp all that was unfolded was to be expected. For many, probably most of the listeners, this was the first hearing of the work. And for these full appreciation was impossible. But despite the inherent difficulties, the failure to know of all that was going on, the entire audience shared in the wealth of the event, and the concluding applause was terrific.

The tremendous popularity of Brahms' first symphony, especially as it is performed by the Boston orchestra, is too well known to need mention at length in this writing. Those who had attended all the Brahms concerts of the week were glad Dr Koussevitzky had waited for the end to present [illegible] most stirring of the composer's pennings. They had heard the second, third and fourth symphonies, but none of these has the mounting excitement, the overwhelming climax of the first. What an ending to a rewarding series, and how the audience did make known its appreciation! It was quite an afternoon up there in the Berkshires.

D. H. W.

Second and Third Symphonies Carol Brice Prove Popular Saturday Night

Lenox, Aug. 4—The second in th Tanglewood series of three all Brahm concerts by Serge Koussevitzky an the Boston Symphony Saturday nigh offered the unusual treat of two symphonies, the second and third, and th "Alto" Rhapsody by the master. Th soloist for the Rhapsody was the Negro contralto, Carol Brice, and th chorus of men was trained by Rober Shaw.

The program was ideal in arrangement and execution, and the un counted radio audience that hear the Rhapsody and the Second sym phony had occasion to remember th program even if there was a "Rhap sody on Tin Cans" for the commer cial finale. Phonograph sales show the Second at the top of popularit among the composer's four sym phonies and surely there is reaso for it. It abounds in melodies of th sort an audience takes home with whistle or a hum, and there is th masterful orchestration and them development that mark all his work

The Second, which closed the pro gram, was given with the broad a tention to detail and wonderful to that distinguish all the performanc by the orchestra. If at times, the was not the detailed following of the master's instructions, it may ha been that the conductor had in mi the Tanglewood audience which ov flowed onto the lawn and numbe more than 10,000. The tone had carry to them, it could be argued.

Soloist Lauded

The appearance of Miss Brice called the introduction several ago by Dr Koussevitzky of Dor Maynor at Tanglewood. Miss has had more experience as was dent in his understanding gras the text. Few soloists can match tonal grandeur of the orchestra, Miss Brice's lower tones were indeed, and her upper tone se even though the work sends the s ist into the soprano register. It a flattering reception that Miss B received and deserved.

The chorus distinguished itself wonderful color and the shading are hallmarks of Shaw training. haps the radio audience was in a sition to comment on diction, but those in the shed, the chorus just a wonderful velvet carpet of upon which Miss Brice could up to the highest notes.

The Third symphony which op the program also is rich in me and such portions as the se movement with its anthemlike t and the powerful finale were t ures indeed.

The all Brahms series more fulfilled the expectations of the lowers of old Johannes, and al those who planned the series. E for Thursday night's weather, series might have broken the Ta wood record. Nearly 60,000 heard the two series.

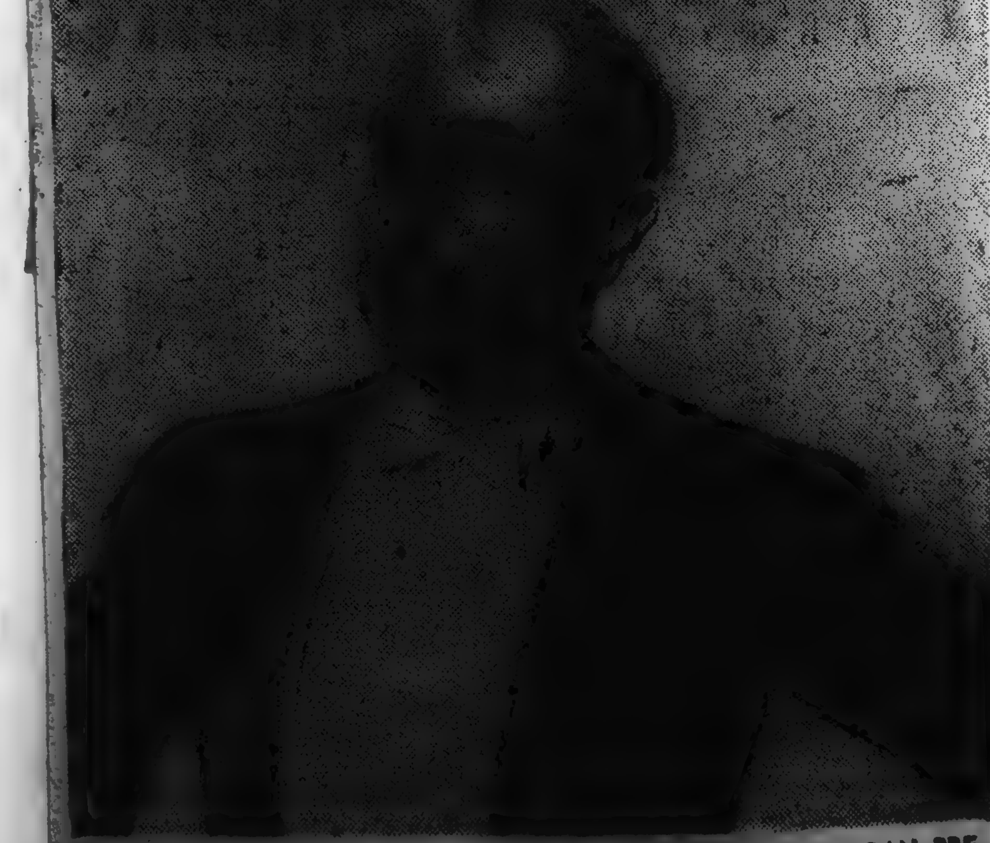
Thursday night, the third and series of festival concerts begins program will feature the Prok Fifth sumphony, the Strauss Eulenspiegel" and the Schu cello concerto, Gregor Piatig soloist.

Tomorrow night, the America miere of "Peter Grimes" which commissioned by the Berkshire center will be given in the th with repeat performances W day and Friday. Benjamin B the composer, will be on hand.

J.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

AUG 4 - 1946



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, WHO WILL CONDUCT THE AMERICAN PREMIERE OF SHOSTAKOVICH'S NINTH SYMPHONY AT 8:30 SATURDAY NIGHT ON KXOK.

N. Y.
UNION

AUG 6 - 1946

Brahms Featured at Tanglewood Festival

With crashing cymbals, mellifluous brasses and fortissimo strings uniting in the stirring finale to Brahms' "First" symphony, re-echoing through the filled-to-capacity music shed and communicated to the thousands seated on the lawns of "Tanglewood"—some 10,000 music lovers in all—it was the consensus that the German composer had never had a finer protagonist than Serge Koussevitzky, bringing the Brahms' series "B" to a completely satisfying conclusion.

One of the most interesting and inspiring programs was that of Saturday night when Dr. Koussevitzky gave magnificent performances of Brahms' "Third" and "Second" symphonies. Between these two melodiously heroic works, Carol Brice, the sensational Negro contralto, making her initial appearance at "Tanglewood" was the soloist with the orchestra, assisted by a large male chorus in Brahms' "Rhapsody for Contralto." Probably, not since Marian Anderson made her debut with the orchestra, several years ago, in this same place, has any singer established a more auspicious concert success. It is a voice of tremendous range and power, evenly scaled from top to bottom, allied with a musical mentality and sensitivity to all shades of tonal coloring. She was recalled to the stage many times, following her majestic performance, the applause of [illegible] by [illegible] and joined by every member of the orchestra.

Sunday afternoon's program also included the Brahm's double concerto for violin and 'cello with the distinguished American woman instrumentalist, Erica Morini and the Russian 'cellist' Gregor Piatigorsky playing the difficult work with an admirable sense of coadjutorship in the ensembles, and Virtuoso performances in the individual solo work of each. While this combination of solo instruments may not have the popular appeal to the audiences as that of a vocalist or pianist, nevertheless, even the severest critic of music could not but admit that it was playing of the highest order. Dr. Koussevitzky offered a fine, elastic orchestral background, and the two soloists were brought back several times for sincere appreciation of their work.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

AUG 15 1946

Music

If Koussevitzky Speaks, Need Music Halt Agape?

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Pontifically and, as always, succinctly, Serge Koussevitzky ripped out of the history of opera some of its most precious pages in a declaration made a few days ago. It created repercussions, as you can readily understand, and the following parable is only a mere echo of certain viewpoints. We present it in all humility:

The world's storehouse of brilliant musical thought—huge vault that it is—has obtained no recent deposits to equal the wealth contributed by none other than Serge Koussevitzky during the course of the latest Berkshire Festival. In those placid mountains that enshrine the rapid-growing Mecca of the sharps and flats one may, if spiritually enlightened, look upon visions far beyond the temporal scene, visions of truth unalterable and of fact incontrovertible.

From on High.

Such a one is Serge Koussevitzky, the good Doctor, who communes, for all we know, with the infinite, while yet finitely—and quite pleasurably—involved with screeching police sirens that regularly announce his arrival at the holy of holies, Tanglewood.

But enough of prefacing and on to the very heart of revelation, as expounded by this august personage of the baton, this prophet, this — can it be? — Mahomet, whose tones ring clear and free through glen and vale and over towering mountaintop.

There are only three divinities of opera, and these are Moussorgsky, Wagner and Bizet. Thus falls the word from the lips of the chosen one. And the faithful, accepting, believing, spread the word in whispers among themselves. And the whispers mount in fervor and sonority, and the birds in the air and the animals in the forests take up the cry and, soon, with the whirling intensity of a gale, all nature joins in the ecstatic song of truth, as it spirals back to its source — the heavens.

Discord in Heavens.

But amid the joyous paean, so frenetically rising skyward, may be heard during occasional lulls—for in all music there are lulls—the thin quavering voices of human dissidents. And these, whose faith is not of those others, yet hold close to credos of their own, less divine, but not less firm.

And the voices say, "What about Mozart? And what about Verdi? And Debussy and Rossini and Beethoven and Gluck and Strauss? Aye, and there are more, so many more, whose names but yesterday burned brightly on the walls of the years."

And the good Doctor, smiling a benign, ethereal smile, responds with the conviction of the anointed that these men did not in their labors fulfill the requirements he himself imposed. And in this manner does he answer his questioners, thus submitting a self-satisfying proof of his passage through the centuries, all-spirit, all-knowing, all-perfect.

And the dissidents, merely specks in the orderly progress of time, yet rally together for one supreme effort of rebuttal, armed, as they are, with the weapons of intelligence. And their voices join in uttering a single stentorian word which—as it catapults from their throats—renders the prophet speechless. And the word is "Nuts"!

NEWS

AUG 6 - 1946

Science Distances the Arts In Race of Progress

Comparison of the relative advances made by science and the arts in preparation for the world of tomorrow will give the award to science as seen by present standards. The arts have lagged behind in the race and for reasons which may be clearly understood. The plain, unvarnished truth is that we have encouraged science and neglected the arts.

While it may not be necessary or wise to neglect anything in the field of science, the time has no doubt arrived for giving more attention to the arts. There is, of course, a great deal to be done in adapting new discoveries to the needs of humanity but the momentum already gained may carry through to greater successes even if we give added attention to cultural affairs.

A recent suggestion by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Berkshire music center at Tanglewood, that there be a subsidy for the arts is much to the point. He did not elaborate then upon the idea, but it is of the highest kind of meaning to every American. The idea intrigues us, as it should when we consider the achievements of the past and the opportunities for the future.

We may well consider that we have no painter comparable to Whistler and no writers of prose and verse of the standing of William Cullen Bryant or of Tanglewood's own Nathaniel Hawthorne. We might well have more men and women of world-wide reputation in music than now. Much has been done at Tanglewood to place us on a higher level of appreciation but there is much more to be done.

The truth is that we have been content to subsidize wheat, corn, potatoes, meat and other commodities to please the palate and fill the stomach while neglecting that which appeals to the nobler senses.

The subsidies for atomic energy and other inventions, while not officially designated as such, were really so in serving to boost research to the highest level ever attained. But we had no subsidies to make it certain that we will lead the world in the arts so the aspiring genius is obliged to pay his way along. It was hard going for the artists, writers and musicians in the decade of the depression and it is evident that the traveling is not particularly good now.

The need is in facilities for study, an abundance of time in which there is no necessity for a job to provide the necessaries of life and opportunities for contact with the public. All of that may be had in the development of the Tanglewood idea in the appropriate setting at Lenox and elsewhere in the Berkshires. Some of the old mansions, no longer needed as homes for the wealthy, might become a part of the structural layout for an institution of higher education in the arts. It might go beyond anything in the universities, making it of advantage for those who have achieved fame to assemble there from all over the world. Of course there would be place for young, ambitious students.

With only a fraction of allotments of funds as compared with what is distributed in subsidies for agriculture and science it might soon be recognized that we are far in the lead of the rest of the world in the arts just as we are in industry and the sciences. It would be a noteworthy achievement for the future if this were done and it would be a fitting memorial to the leadership which has made Tanglewood famous far and wide. Why not have a permanent Tanglewood on a large scale with the backing of government funds?

AUG 4 1946

Echoes From Tanglewood

Imagine ten thousand people sitting in a glorified band shell or on the lawn around it, spellbound by the music poured out by 112 men under the baton of the incomparable Koussevitsky. That was Tanglewood at the reopening of the traditional music festival, interrupted by the war. Any music would have been enhanced by the loveliness of its setting, the 50-acre homestead of Nathaniel Hawthorne, with its ancient trees, sloping lawns, formal garden and fountain, vineyard and orchard, the old house, now the office of the music school set up by Koussevitsky; at the foot of the eastern hillside a gleaming lake (the Stockbridge bowl), and all around the rolling green Berkshires. Add to this the music of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the musicians, favorite in this country and the peer of any now in Europe, and the unprecedented throngs aren't surprising.

The maestro offered in three concerts such diverse pieces as the Ninth symphony of Shostakovitch (its American premiere), that good old piece of whole wheat bread and butter, the Fifth of Tchaikovski, and Aaron Copland's ballet suite, "Apalachian Spring," a work of great beauty and charm. Beethoven was represented by his "Eroica" and "Pastoral" symphonies, Menedelssohn by his "Italian." The only concerto was the Second of Rachmaninoff, in which Eugene List—the same who played for the president at Potsdam—got an ovation after a performance less than his best. His young charm and genuine modesty accounted for some of the outpouring of affectionate admiration.

Smaller compositions played were two favorites, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite by Ravel. The Copland piece, made from ballet music written for Martha Graham, proved extraordinarily beautiful and moving. It embodies early Americana in the form of old Shaker tunes, though written in the modern idiom, and was named "Appalachian Spring" by the dancer herself. The composer took a bow, as he had at the public rehearsal and also after another suite of his, a sextet, was presented in a chamber music recital earlier in the week. On this occasion Louis Speyer conducted and in the front row center sat Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, a sprig of 82 who underwrites these concerts and another series in Washington, with Mr. Copland and Andre Lourie, whose piece "The Birth of Beauty" had just been given its American premiere. Mrs. Coolidge held court at intermission, receiving homage from many distinguished looking people, musicians and public figures, including Secretary and Mrs. Morgenthau, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, and Willi Kapell, piano prodigy who played here a year ago.

For this concert, small orchestral groups were supplemented by the harpsichord, (played by the bearer of two distinguished names, Putnam Aldrich), a Polish soprano, Vishnevska who sang like Jennie Tourel but hadn't as good a voice, and a chorus of 1 beautiful young sopranos from Tanglewood school. Miss Vishnevska sang alone the long romantic "Seven Delights of Love," Lorenza di Mediec's famous poem set to music by Malipero and given its first performance at the concert.

DALLAS, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD

AUG 7 1946

New Opera Bows In

By OLIN DOWNES

New York Times Music Editor.

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 7.—"Peter Grimes," the opera by the librettist Montagu Slater and the composer Benjamin Britten, designated by Serge Koussevitzky before the curtain [illegible] opera that came "first after Carmen," was given its American premiere by the students' orchestra, chorus and soloists of the Berkshire Music Centre Monday evening in the Opera Concert Theater at Tanglewood. Leonard Bernstein conducted.

The performance of a modern and very difficult score was an astonishingly brilliant, by the orchestra, by the chorus, and, in the sum of it, by gifted and intelligent solo interpreters, whose sincerity was contagious.

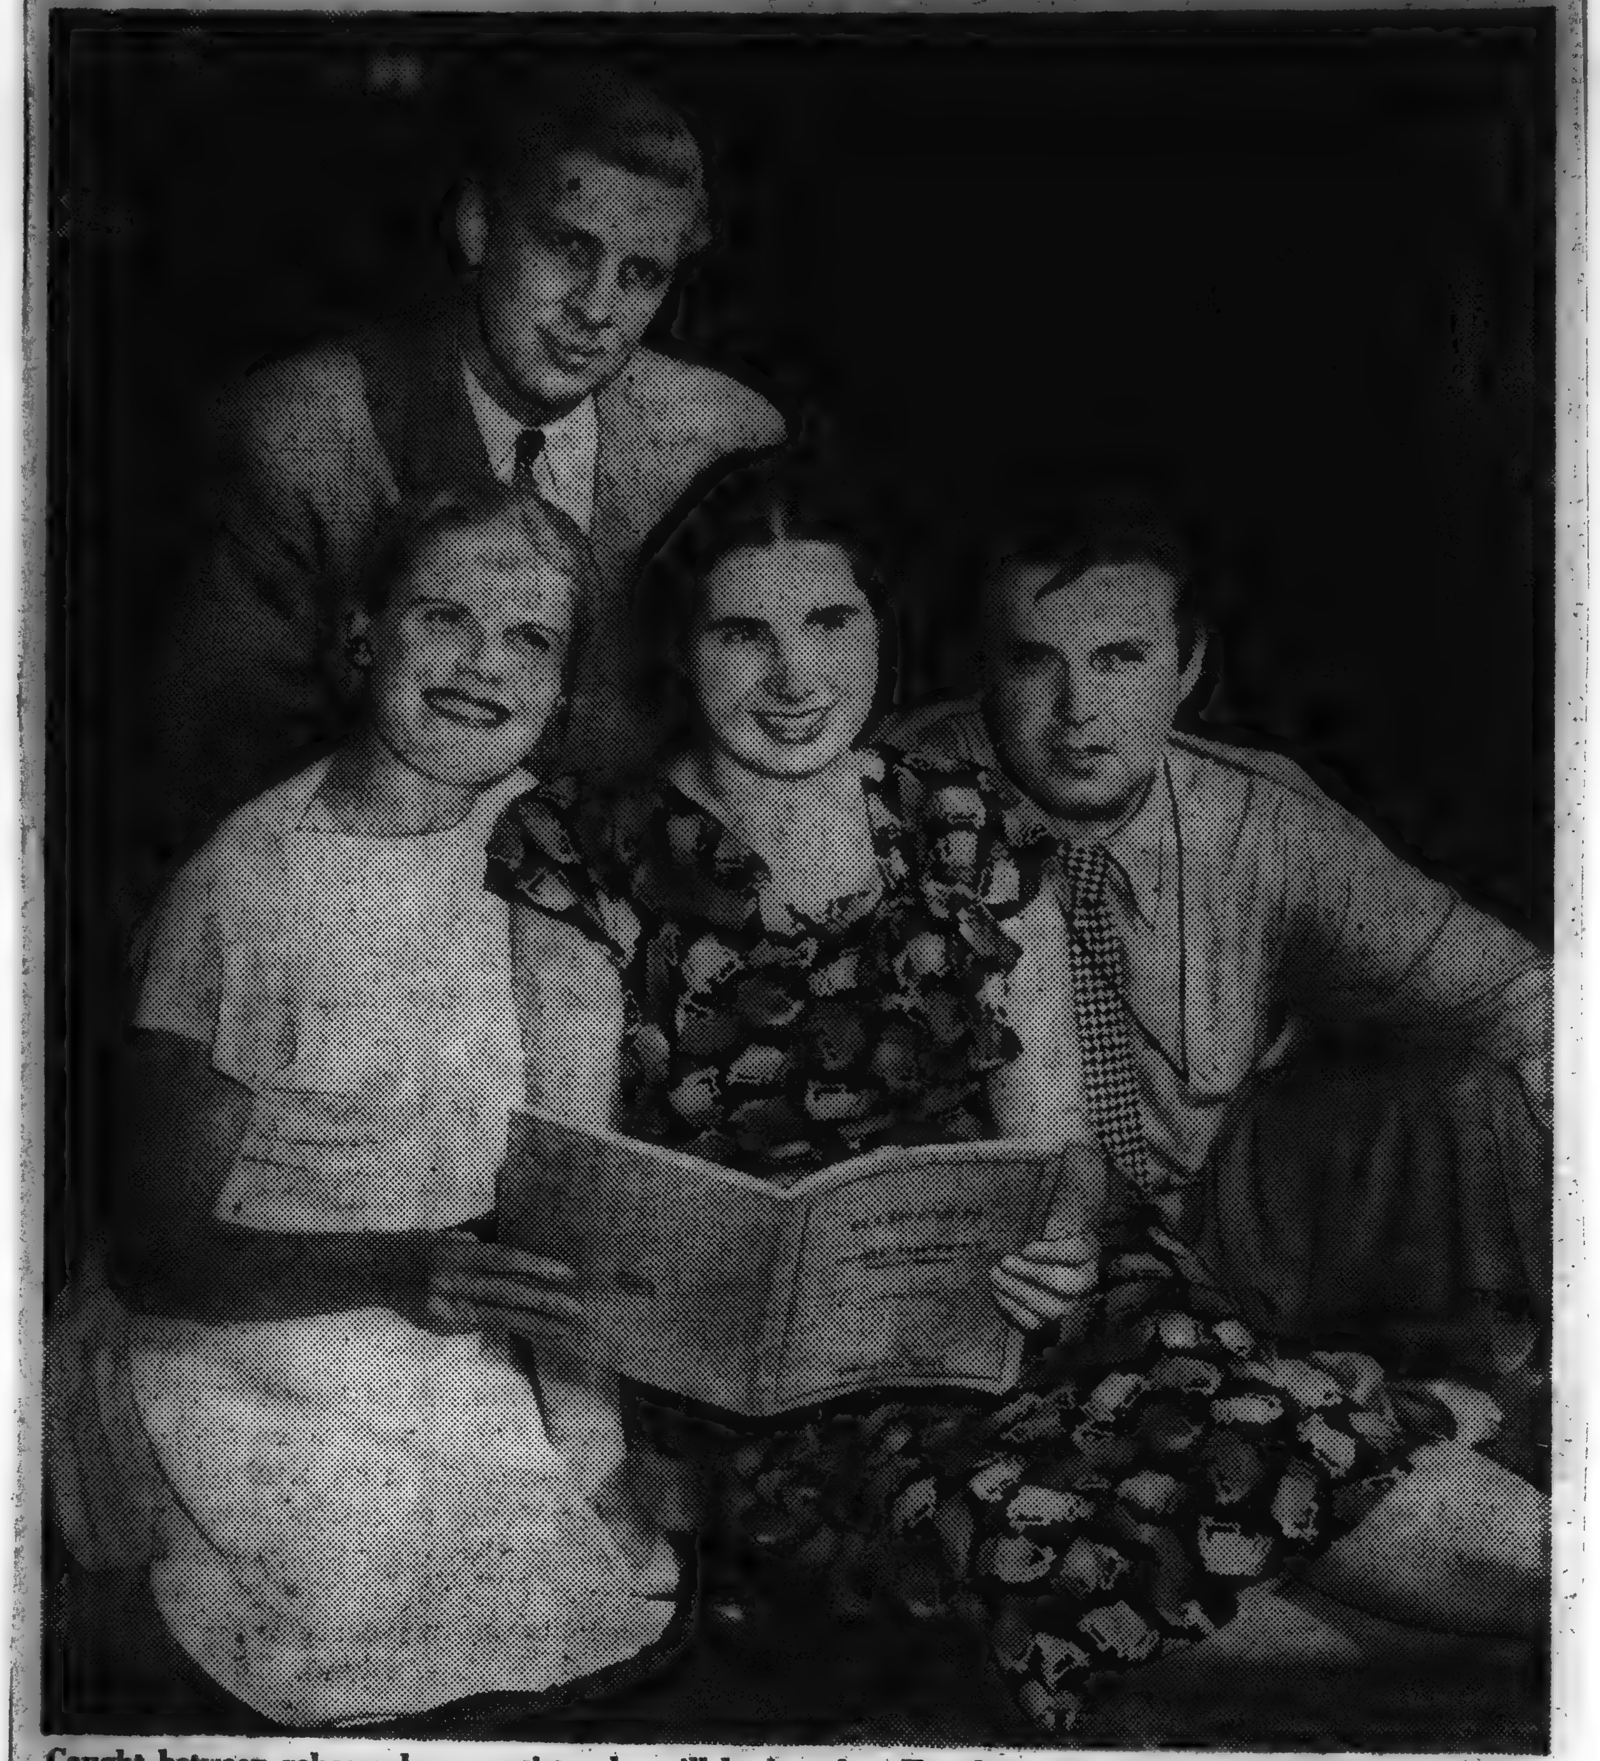
It is known that this score had been commissioned of Mr. Britten by Dr. Koussevitzky, representing the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation, which he established in the memory of his late wife, Natalie Koussevitzky, to whom the opera is dedicated.

Out of certain of his verses, Mantagu Slater has evolved a libretto which centers about the character of Grimes the fisherman, a thwarted dreamer, rebel, sadist and misfit with his fellows.

The opera has been designated as one not easy to estimate from the traditional standpoint. That is so true that one asks whether in actual fact it is an opera at all. For despite its famed realism, mostly lugged in for theatrical purposes sometimes realized and sometimes naively mishandled, it is nearer a dramatic oratorio with stage settings than it is to a living, breathing music drama.

Tanglewood Soloists

Aug 10 '46



Caught between rehearsals are artists who will be heard at Tanglewood tomorrow for Beethoven's ninth symphony, with which Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will close the Berkshire Festival tomorrow afternoon, Miss Frances Yeend, soprano; James Pease, bass; Miss Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor.

[illegible] REPUBLICAN HERALD

AUG 10 [illegible]

Shostakovich Work Gets U. S. Premiere As Boston Symphony Closes Series

The most important event of the current music season in this country, the long-awaited hearing of Shostakovich's latest symphony, the No. 9, will be brought to American radio listeners by the American Broadcasting Company today, when the Boston Symphony orchestra presents its ~~fifth and~~ final broadcast from the Berkshire Music festival, over Radio Station KWNO from 7:30 to 8:30 p. m.

Premiered November 3, 1945, over the Moscow radio in a broadcast from Leningrad, the work attracted world-wide attention. Dr. George Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, immediately moved to present the score here. The American Broadcasting Company received the rights to give the score its American radio premiere.

Ever since the Soviet composer presented his Symphony No. 7, it was reported that he planned a trilogy to commemorate the war and finally victory. The tragic color of the No. 7 and the No. 8 was to be contrasted with the "victory" idea of the No. 9. Shostakovich admitted the original idea, but is said now to regard the No. 9 as a "bridge" toward another work. He has said that it was written after three attempts although the idea came to him in 1943, two years after completion of the No. 8.

Five Movements

The Ninth Symphony is in five movements, all exuberant but the fourth section, which is a "largo." It has been described by Robert Magidof of the New York Times magazine staff as "simple, unsophisticated and gay." Magidof was one of four who heard the composer play it on the piano a few hours after he had completed it.

Soviet critics style the new work as the closest Shostakovich has come to the classical school in all his writing. It is in direct contrast to much of his previous output and is youthfully exuberant and thoroughly happy in style.

The "new" style of the composer is said to be due to the fact that while he was writing the No. 9, he and a fellow composer, Dimitri Kabalevsky, whose scores also have been heard over ABC under Dr. Koussevitzky's, baton, spent their evenings playing Haydn symphonies on the piano. The work was written in the rest home of the Soviet composers union near Ivanovo. The two composers varied their Haydn diet with occasional Mozart and Beethoven works.

Story of Composing

Because Shostakovich was occupied with state examinations at the Moscow conservatory, where he is professor of composition, the first movement took six weeks to complete. He finished the second movement in a week, the third in eight days, while the fourth and fifth movements took five days each.

The score takes 25 minutes to play. In its first performances, E. A Ravinski was the conductor. The score has not been heard outside of Russia.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra, also has listed Tchaikovsky's familiar "1812 Overture."

Tonight's broadcast will be the final by the Boston Symphony orchestra in the current season.

At Tanglewood Today and Tomorrow

TONIGHT

8.15—Berkshire Festival concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

SUNDAY

*10.30—Department 2 chamber music concert.

3.30—Final Berkshire Festival Concert of 1946 season.

*Open to Friends of Berkshire Music Center.

---

erkshire Evening

tsfield, Massachusetts. Saturday, August 10, 19

Expect Record Audiences For Week End at Tanglewood

All Seats in Shed Sold for Tonight And Tomorrow Afternoon—Demand For Rooms Exceeds Last Week End

A record audience for the two concluding programs of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is predicted for tonight and tomorrow afternoon, if the weather is fair. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first radio performance of Dmitri Shostakovitch's ninth symphony, which will be heard at 9.30 over ABC network.

The demand for rooms in Lenox and other towns is greater than that of last week end, and all seats have been sold in the Festival Shed for both concerts. Admission will be sold to the grounds, from which 11,000 heard the concerts last week end.

Mischa Elman, soloist for the Martinu violin concerto on tonight's program, is a native of Russia, who made his first public appearance at the age of seven. He studied with Leopold Auer at the St. Petersburg Conservatory and made his debut in Berlin in 1904, playing for the first time in America with the Russian Symphony Orchestra. His first of several appearances with the Boston Orchestra was in 1909 in Tchaikovsky's concerto, which he played again with them last November.

Sunday Soloists

Soloists for Beethoven's ninth symphony tomorrow afternoon will be students at the Berkshire Music Center, who will sing with the Festival chorus, recruited from the school and prepared by Robert Shaw. Miss Frances Yeend will sing the soprano part; Miss Eunice Alberts, contralto; Joseph Laderoute, tenor; and James Pease, bass. Miss Yeend and the two men sang leading roles in the opera "Peter Grimes."

A chamber music concert will be given under the direction of Gregor Piatigorsky by Department 2 orchestra tomorrow morning at 10.30. The program will include a woodwind quartet by Charles Schiff; phantasy quartet for oboe and strings by Benjamin Britten, composer of "Peter Grimes"; string quartet in D minor by Mozart and octet for wind instruments by Stravinsky. Friends of the Berkshire Music Center are invited.

The Berkshire Music Center school will close its fourth season with the last Festival concert tomorrow. Some members of the faculty and other members of the Boston orchestra, as well as students will remain in the Berkshires for a vacation. Those who do not have reservations for the season are finding it difficult to rent houses or engage rooms in hotels, though rooms are available through August in private homes.

The programs follow for the final concerts:

MIAMI, FLA. HERALD

AUG 10 1946

Radio Programs

By MARION AITCHISON

OUTSTANDING EVENT of the summer musical season takes place tonight when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts Boston Symphony orchestra in the American radio premiere of Symphony No. 9 by Dmitri Shostakovich, leading contemporary Russian composer.

The occasion is the fifth and final broadcast from Berkshire Music Festival which will be carried by ABC-WGBS at 9:30 p. m. The symphony had its premiere Nov. 3, 1945, in a broadcast from Leningrad over Moscow Radio and was immediately requested by Dr. Koussevitzky for presentation in this country. The Ninth is in five movements, only one of them a largo. It has been described as "simple, unsophisticated and gay." In addition to the Shostakovich work, the orchestra will present Tschaikowsky's familiar "1812 Overture."

Shostakovich

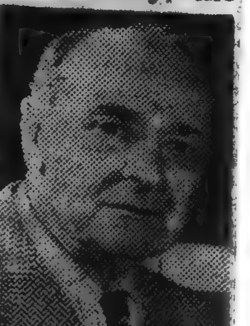
DES MOINES, IOWA TRIBUNE

AUG 10 1946

Airglances

By Mary Little.

ONE of the most important events of the current music season in this country, the long-awaited hearing of Shostakovich's latest symphony, the No. 9, will be brought to American radio listeners when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents its fifth and final broadcast from the Berkshire Music Festival at 7:30 p. m. KRNT-WNAX.



KOUSSEVITZKY.

Premiered November 3, 1945, over the Moscow radio in a broadcast from Leningrad, the work attracted world-wide attention and was made a news story in the Soviet press. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, immediately moved to present the score here.

Ever since the Soviet composer presented his Symphony No. 7, it was reported that he planned a trilogy to commemorate the war and finally victory. The tragic color of the No. 7 and the No. 8 was to be contrasted with the "victory" idea of the No. 9.

FORT WAYNE, IND. JOURNAL-GAZETTE

AUG 10 1946

Recording Of Symphony Planned For Composer

The radio premier in the United States of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9 will be recorded and sent to the composer at his home in Russia.

The radio premiere, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at 8:30, will mark the first airing of the work outside of Russia.

The new work, of 25 minutes duration, is in five movements. According to an analysis by Daniel Zhitomirsky, published in the "Voks Soviet Music Chronicle No. 9" last year just before the world premiere in Russia, the new score requires an orchestra similar to those used in the classic period, the instruments being paired with a piccolo added.

Shostakovich, in this symphony, touched with parody and grotesqueness, recalls his first symphony, the ballet "Golden Age." and his opera "Nose." Although classic in style, even Mozartean at times, his own ironic idiom and sense of comedy have not been overlooked, according to this analysis.

The program will be on WOWO.

THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

Cir. (D 3,527)

This Clipping From PERU, ILL.
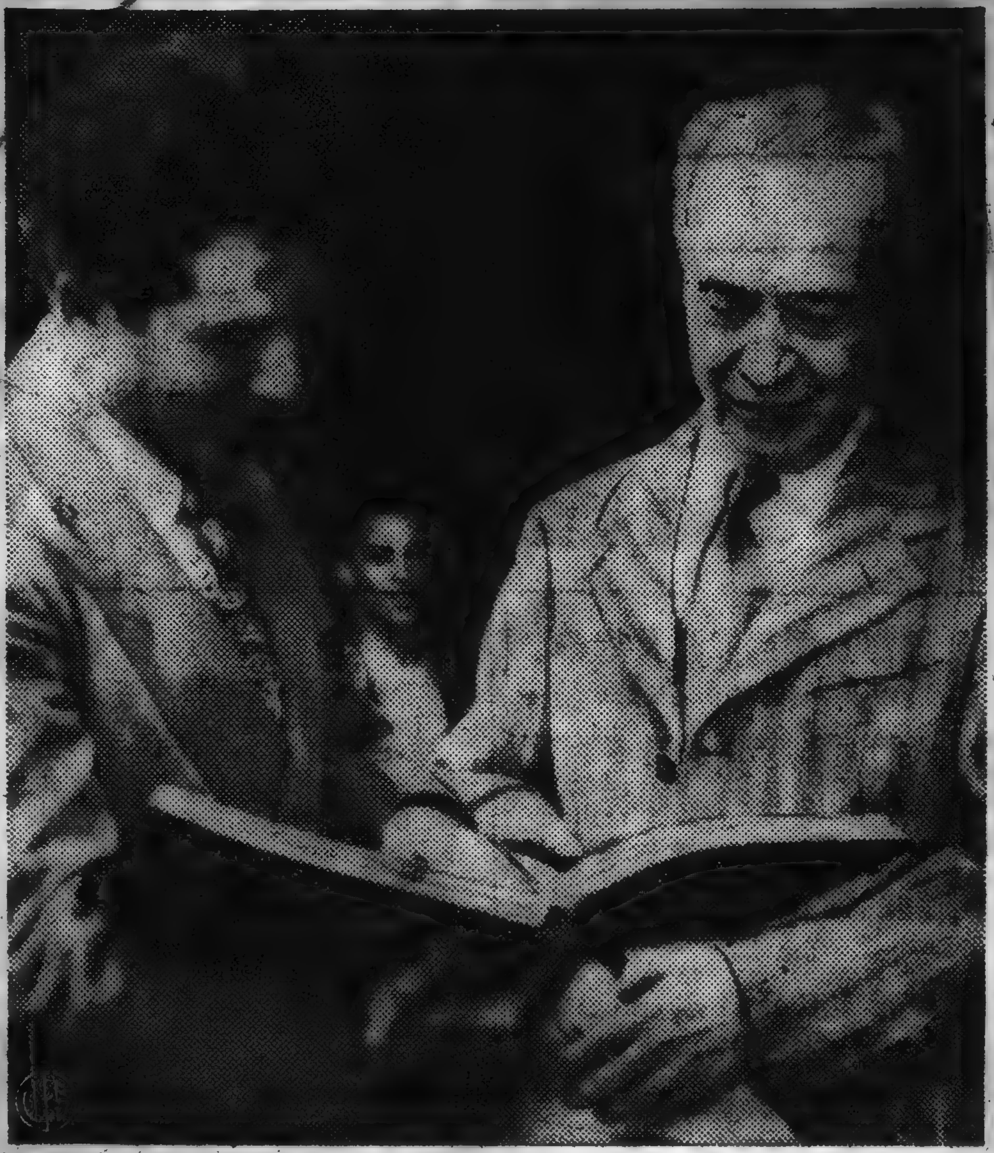
NEWS HERALD

AUG 10 1946



FESTIVAL SINGER—William Horne, left, tenor selected by Serge Koussevitzky to sing title role in American premiere ~~of English opera,~~ "Peter Grimes," at Berkshire music festival, goes over the score with Dr. Koussevitzky. The presentation of the opera is considered one of the year's most important musical events. It will be given Aug. 6.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
AMSTERDAM STAR NEWS
AUG 10 1946

Brice Scores In Berkshire Debut

By NORA HOLT

Dr. Koussevitzky's dream of a great American Center of Music was significantly brought to a closer realization than he or his sponsors, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., could possibly have envisaged, when Carol Brice, an American Negro contralto stepped upon the stage of the Berkshire Festival, Saturday evening, to be guest soloist with the 110-piece Boston Symphony and a 72-voice male chorus in the presentation of Brahms' seldom-performed "Rhapsody for Contralto, Male Chorus and Orchestra, Opus 53."

Dr. Koussevitzsky is known for his zeal in the interest of young musicians of all races, and on the day he first heard Miss Brice sing, he exclaimed that her voice was like a 'cello, and soon after she was invited to appear at the Festival.

Displays Glamorous Effects

From the moment she made her entrance, 11,000 musicians and music-lovers, representing eminent conductors, composers and critics, greeted the lovely brown-hued young woman with warm ovations of confidence and assurance. It was a manifestation of trust in the judgement of the revered conductor who selected her for the debut in Brahms impressive work.

We read the score in the dimness of a pocket flash light and from the opening of the recitative, "Aber abseits, wer ist's?" of Goethe's resurgent poem, "Harzreise in Winter", the organ like colouring of Miss Brice's voice swept the wide intervals without a noticeable change of register, producing a feeling of brooding solitude. She kept her voice, admirably suited to this sublime Brahms opus, to the line and atmosphere without pressing of forcing the flow for glamorous effects.

This musical intelligence was in keeping with the solemn and measured tempo set by the conductor, who led the orchestra and full-bodied chorus with great dignity and abiding understanding of Brahms' inspired setting. Ringing applause filled the Shed as Miss Brice returned again and again to acknowledge the generous commendation. After the concert, Dr. Koussevitzsky with Miss Brice on his right, received the compliments of all those who could comfortably get into the small dressing room. His words to me were, "She is a highly gifted young woman, and I have already commissioned a composer to write a symphony with contralto obbligato for her which she will perform with the Boston Symphony next season.

"Super Mind" "Superb Reading"

The Fifth Program of the orchestra also included Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90 and Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 73. The magnificent performance of the F major, less spectacular and more personal than the D major, was a message of deep emotion.

Never have we heard an orchestrated work so delicately etched, so finely traced. No inner voice, no matter how shaded, was lost as each section of the strings vibrated in equal power as if one giant instrument were being played by a super mind and hands.

Such ecstacy as Dr. Koussevitzsky evoked by his superb reading of Brahms is something that can occur only on those rare occasions when the rapport between performer and hearer is at its heighth of transported emotion.

DES MOINES, IOWA
REGISTER
AUG 10 1946

Airglances

By Mary Little.

THE play by play report on the East-West All American Boys baseball tilt will be aired by Harry Wismer, A B C sports commentator, over KRNT at 12:30 p. m. followed at 3 p. m. by a play by play report and color story of the Brooklyn—Philadelphia game. Jon Hackett of KRNT reports for the latter.

WISMER.

Iowans will have their ear on the West team for in its lineup will be Eddie McNeil of Somers, Ia., named by Sec Taylor, Register and Tribune sports editor. Also from nearby states will be Jean Ferryman of Omaha, Neb., Wayne Robinson of Minneapolis, Minn., Arnold Fischer of St. Paul, Minn., and Jerry Ahrens of St. Louis, Mo.

* * *

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the American premiere of Dimitri Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9, 7:30 p. m. KRNT-WNAX . . . American Melodies, a new musical featuring the ABC Symphony orchestra, makes its bow Saturday, Aug. 17, in the period held by the Boston Symphony.

* * *

Gov. Dwight H. Green, Illinois, will be the speaker on the National Barn Dance, 7 p. m. WHO, when the cast broadcasts from the Illinois State fair in Springfield. Guest for the evening will be Roy Rogers. Joe Kelly will be m.c.

* * *

ROCKFORD, ILL.
STAR
AUG 10 1946

PREMIERE

For a little while tonight, peopl who like to listen to music can for get the troubled world's postwa problems. They can forget our at tempts to understand Russia, ou ally in war and our adversary i peace; they can forget the rumor of aggressive Russian nationalism and the threatening overtones tha we may hear in those rumors. The can turn on their radios and listen to this country's great New England orchestra, the Boston Symphony, play a masterwork by great Russian composer, with brilliant Russian-born conducto directing.

The Ninth Symphony by Dmitri Shostakovich has its American radic premiere tonight, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. We are proud to note that our News Tower neighbor, radio station WROK, will broadcast the program at 8:30.

You may think that you don't care much for modern music. You may think that Shostakovich lets his violins dwell too long and insistently in the thin and sometimes disturbingly shrill treble reaches. You may think that he is often musically verbose. And then you listen again to a Shostakovich work, and you find yourself deeply stirred; excited, as you are when you read a new book and find it profound and tender and wise and a thrilling story to boot. And you remember Russia's dark days; days when the Germans were moving east, and when Leningrad, where Shostakovich was a fire warden, grimly endured bombings and bitter cold and starvation. You remember the Seventh Symphony, which came out of the siege of Leningrad.

If you listen tonight, the ties between the Russian people and our people, between their artists and musicians and our artists and musicians, will seem much more important than any of the things that have happened—in diplomacy or international politics or military administration—to weaken those ties.

DAYTON, O.
HERALD
AUG 10 1946

Special mention was made by the Circle of David Diamond's "Rounds for String Orchestra." This work is not new this season but was named as worthy of the American orchestral repertoire. It was composed in 1944 on a commission from Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis symphony.

Special citation was made, too, of Charles Ives' Third Symphony which had its world premiere in April by the New York Little Symphony. However, it was composed 40 years ago and did not come under the Circle's classification of first performance.

No award was made in chamber music. Miles Kastendieck, New York correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor comments on this fact, "Here again only one work has been singled out (by the Circle) over the years: Andrew Imbrie's Quartet in B-flat. The reason for this apparent dearth of chamber music works comes not because it has no composers but because very little of it is being played in our concert halls at present. Most of the chamber music heard during a New York season is in the hands of the New Friends of Music, which has followed a conservative policy and has adhered for the most part to the standard European repertory."

The annual orchestral award of the Music Critics Circle of New York City was presented to Samuel Barber for his Concerto for Violincello and Orchestra, Opus 22.

This award is made for a United States work considered exceptional among new orchestral works of the year. Barber's work was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitsky in Boston, April 5. Later in April the Boston orchestra played it at the Brooklyn Academy of Music and Carnegie hall. Raya Garbousova was soloist.

This is the first time that a concerto received the award. Symphonies have gained it heretofore. Previous composers accorded first place by the Circle are William Schumann, Paul Creston, Leonard Bernstein and Walter Piston.

Dissonance in the Music World

The newsprint spat between Dr. Koussevitzky and Alphonse Pelletier has all the elements of a tempest in a teapot, or to transpose the figure, a trombone in a showerbath.

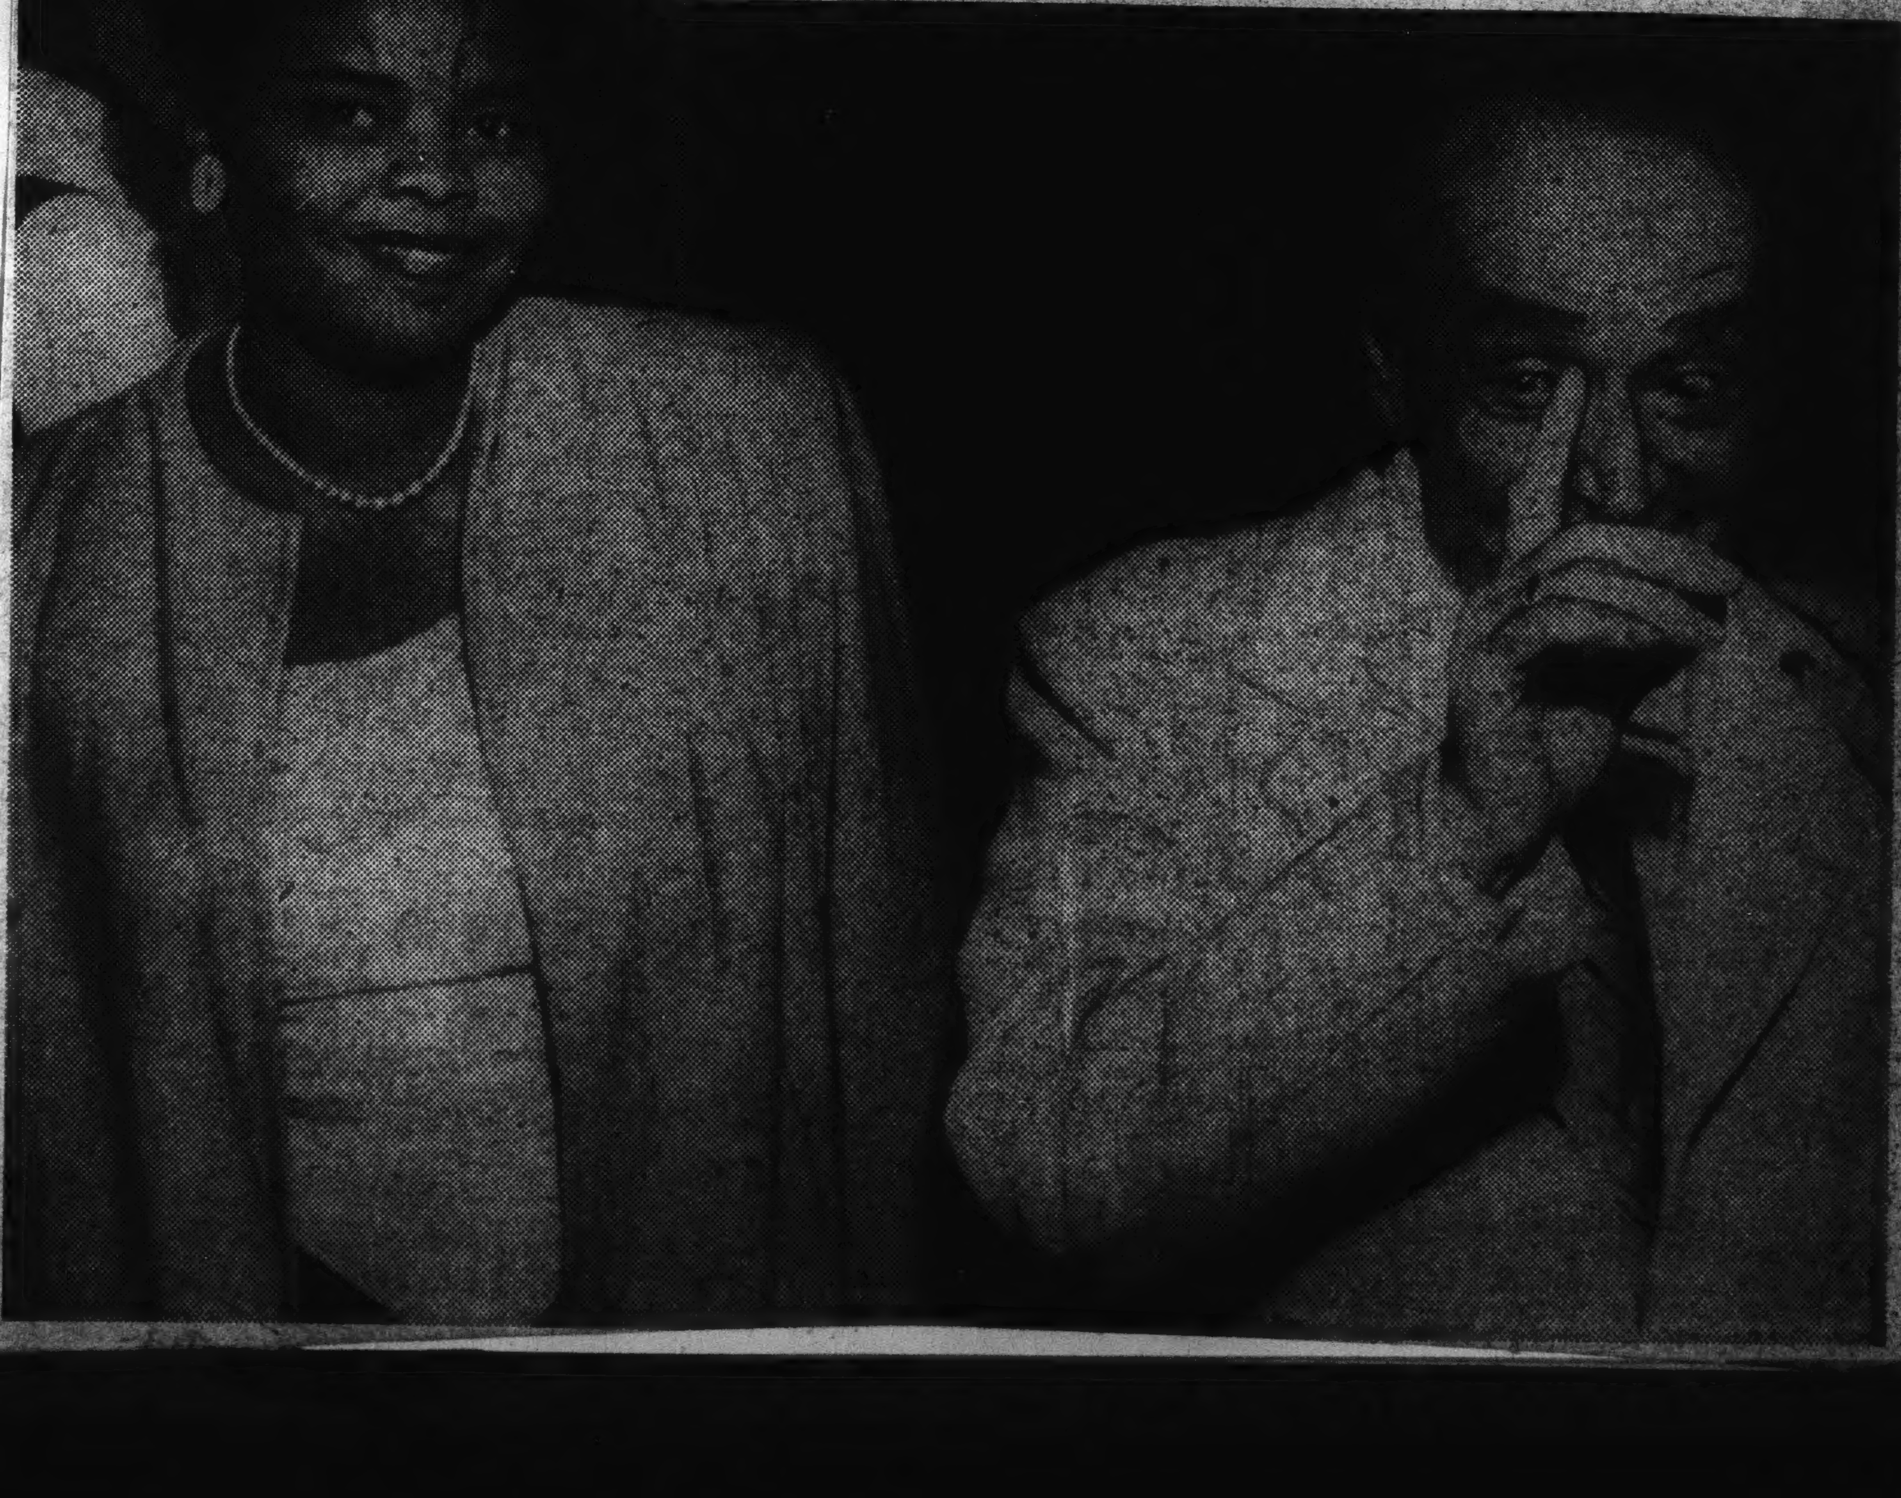
It was unfortunate perhaps that Mr. Pelletier was not in the audience at the Berkshire Museum when Dr. Koussevitzky with his characteristic enthusiasm and fervor was extolling the virtues of the student orchestra at the Berkshire Music Center. Then he would have been able to judge whether Dr. Koussevitzky's comparisons were made as a considered, sober-faced judgment or as a hyperbolic element of his boundless enthusiasm for an enterprise which he conceived alone and brought to flower and which is more significant perhaps from the creative standpoint than the Berkshire Festival itself.

On the other hand, Mr. Pelletier's musical pique is understandable. As a member of the Cleveland Orchestra for many years before taking up residence in Berkshire County, the sensitivity to his professional standards would not have been touched had Dr. Koussevitzky been less specific. Locally, Mr. Pelletier has had considerable experience in training the young in ensemble performance. He knows, therefore, how much success depends on the enthusiasm of the conductor and the element of instilling confidence and pride in the performers.

Both obviously must be in full agreement on that. The difference then seems a question of tempi. That we gingerly leave to the critics. It's their biscuit.

Aug 10

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZSKY, revered conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whispers to a musical friend, "She (Miss Brice) is a very gifted young woman. I have already commissioned a composer to write a symphony with a contralto obligato for her, which she will sing with the B.S. next season." Miss Brice is at right. (See story on Page 1).



[256]

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND